*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) assured the hon. Gentleman that there was no difference at all in the treatment which Scotland and England received in regard to demands made upon the Office of Works year by year. Any apparent inequality was accounted for by the fact that they could not deal with the whole of the demands for new buildings in any one year, and they had to deal with them more or less according to the requirements and necessities for buildings to be completed by a certain date. So far as policy was concerned, they knew no difference as between Scotland and England, except that of first urgency. With regard to Cardiff, they asked for an expenditure of £5,000 for buildings; the site was paid for last year, and they hoped to finish the building next year. The delay which had occurred had been owing to legal difficulties in regard to title and conveyance, and also as to some existing lights. The question had been at last settled between the owner and the authorities, and the arrangements and buildings appeared to satisfy all the interests concerned. With regard to Somerset House, they were building near Clement's Inn at present a large laboratory, and, considering the important nature of the work to be carried on in it, it was necessary to go in for expenditure on electric light. With respect to Bristol, it had been arranged that the actual purchase money for the site should not be paid until the building was completed. The arrangement was one which was somewhat unusual, but it was one which the particular local circumstances appeared to justify. On the general question of the maintenance of buildings in England and Scotland there was no difference at all between the treatment of the two countries, though they had not the same demands from Scotland as from England.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that Scotland received similar treatment to England. He denied that. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take steps to put matters on a more satisfactory footing as between Scotland and England. Scotland was being starved to death. Then as to lights, fuel and household articles in the post offices of the two countries, he found a great discrepancy between them. If London, for example, was spending too much, the question should be examined, and if Scotland was starved in the matter of such articles, the right hon. Gentleman should treat Scotland more liberally.

MR. CALDWELL drew attention to the post office buildings, and pointed out that there should be taken into consideration in the cost of such buildings their probable liability to asessment for local rates. A building was erected on a valuable site, and the locality asked that it should be an ornament to the town. No sooner was a building of the kind erected than the Government was come down upon by the local authorities, who said that the valuation of the building and the site ought to be a great deal more than it was, and therefore more money paid to the local rates. The Treasury, he thought, could only deal with this question when the buildings were being erected, and it should say, "We will erect the buildings on a less valuable site; this will suit the purposes of the post office equally well, and we can erect plainer buildings." They were entitled, therefore, to complain of the Government for putting up expensive buildings, where equally suitable buildings for a post office might suffice, thereby rendering the Government less liable to a probable large amount of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman should take into consideration the ultimate liablity that would follow from the erection of expensive buildings, and an understanding should be come to with the locality that if they wanted ornamental and expensive buildings, such as appeared to be the case in England, the local taxation should not be increased. In Scotland their requirements in this respect were more modest.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS pointed out that the Secretary to the Treasury was the official who should properly answer for the Post Office. The arrangements with regard to the sites for post offices were made by the Post Office Department. The doctrine of the hon. Member would, however, be an unpopular one, for every town seemed to desire the erection of a building which should be a credit to it. Scotsmen, he found, were as keen about the beautification of their towns as the English people.

Vote agreed to.

2. £159,100 to complete the sum for Public Buildings, Great Britain.

Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) appealed to the First Commissioner on the subject of the maintenance and protection of ancient monuments. He wished to know whether it was the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had taken advantage of the clever arrangement made by the Navy League for the decoration of the Nelson Column in October last to engage a steeplejack for a small sum of money to effect certain repairs on the top of the monument? Had a contribution been made to the Navy League towards the considerable expense incurred by them in erecting the marvellous network of ladders up the column? Could the right hon. Gentleman reconcile his patriotic conduct in this matter with the conduct of another Department, which he would not name, which allowed the memory of Nelson to be covered with obloquy? [Cries of "Order!" and laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: Order, order! I do not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman can contend that the Nelson Monument is an ancient monument. [Laughter.]

Vote agreed to.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,—

"That a sum, not exceeding £22,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces and Marlborough House."

Mr. WEIR proposed, "That Item A (salaries, wages, and allowances), be reduced by £10, in respect of Holyrood Palace," in order to call attention to the insufficient staff and the charging of fees at Holyrood Palace. He was in favour of getting rid of the fees. The pictures in the Banqueting Hall of the Palace were mostly daubs, which were not worth 60s. apiece. If the right hon. Gentleman would send to Holyrood some of the Raphael's and Murillo's from the National Gallery it would at least contain something worth paying to see. He begged to move to reduce the Vote by £10 in respect of Holyrood Palace.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that he promised last year to give this question every attention, and he had come to the conclusion that it was an anomaly to charge fees for viewing a Royal Palace in Edinburgh, when the same practice did not prevail in connection with Hampton Court and some other old palaces in England. He was not in a position to make any change this year, but he was prepared to say that, subject to certain arrangements to be made with the Corporation of Edinburgh, this item for fees appearing in the Appropriation-in-Aid would not again appear.

Mr. WEIR asked leave to withdraw his Amendment?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. T. W. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could make arrangements for giving the public greater facilities for viewing Buckingham Palace, which contained valuable collections of Dutch pictures and china. At present few people ever saw them. These collections, he believed, were made over to the nation by George IV., and, therefore, it was only reasonable that the public should be permitted to see them. Palaces in this country were, generally speaking, less accessible to the public than palaces in foreign countries.

Mr. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) thought it would be a great boon to the public to admit them to Buckingham Palace at certain times of the year when Her Majesty was not in residence. There were also works of art in St. James's Palace to which the public would be very glad to have access.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) observed that St. James's Palace was a very ugly collection of buildings on one of the best sites in London, and asked whether there was any intention of demolishing it and of erecting in its place a building with greater pretension to architectural beauty.

Sir HENRY HOWORTH (Salford, S.) agreed that it would be an immense boon to the public and students of art if they could be given freer access to Buckingham Palace, and suggested that a popular official catalogue should be prepared. He also thought that when the Palace was empty, it would be reasonable to admit the public to the gardens under proper regulations. He did not share the view of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis with regard to St. James's Palace, which was a building of great historical interest. That interest was continuous. Only the other day he was turning over some correspondence in the great Manchester Library, and found some letters written by the General who commanded the famous regiment which was in charge of the House when Cromwell cleared it. After the General's marriage, Cromwell assigned him St. James's Palace as a residence, and it was curious to come across his letters written from there; they were all headed "James's," the word palace being designedly omitted. There was one other story which he should like to recall to hon. Members' minds in this connection. When Queen Anne had her famous quarrel with the Duchess of Marlborough, the latter was living in St. James's Palace, and the Queen ordered the Chamberlain to turn Her Grace out, and put all her furniture into the courtyard. The Duchess revenged herself by buying a plot of land close by on which she built Marlborough House, but the Queen would never allow her to make an approach on the side of the grounds next to the palace. That accounted for the long blank wall without a gateway that faced the Palace. This wall, he thought, might be made a little more sightly.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) hoped it would be found possible to throw Buckingham Palace and gardens open to the public at certain seasons. The grounds covered 40 acres and were very beautiful. In Berlin and other Continental capitals it would be thought very strange that so large a garden should be closed to the public. Of course there was no thought of interfering with Her Majesty's privacy.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLES said he understood the suggestion to be that Her Majesty should be approached, and asked to permit Buckingham Palace to be seen when the Court was not in residence. Hon. Members would recognise that there was a difference between the case of Buckingham Palace and the case of Hampton Court or the Tower, but this was not a matter for his decision. However, he would consider the matter and take care that the opinions of hon. Members were duly represented to the Department concerned. ["Hear, hear!"] On the subject of St. James's Palace, he did not share the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Lynn Regis, having always been under the impression that that was a building of which the nation was proud, and which they would be sorry to see removed. It was originally built by Henry VIII., and for many years the Sovereigns resided there.

Mr. WEIR proposed, "That Item E (Maintenance and Repairs), be reduced by £10, in respect of Holyrood Palace," the furniture and tapestries of which had been injured. He hoped steps would be taken to protect them in future.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he had had his attention called to the matter.

He had visited Holyrood Palace, and saw that there was some ground for complaint. There was no doubt that the tapestries were injured some years ago, but greater care had been taken of them since then, and he did not think it likely that the injury would be repeated. The tapestries had been repaired.

MR. WEIR asked if the right hon. Gentleman would have a railing put round the tapestries?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he would not pledge himself to that at present, as he was not certain how far it would be feasible, but he would bear the suggestion in mind.

MR. WEIR asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES called attention to the expenditure on fuel, light, water, and household articles in several of the "grace and favour" Palaces. He would like some little account of these items in regard to St. James's Palace, Kensington Palace, and Hampton Court.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said there was no case in which the tenants of "grace and favour" residences received light and fuel, and in these cases the expenditure must be for the general keeping up of the buildings. Very great care was exercised to watch these items, but he would further look into the matter.

MR. CALDWELL thought the right hon. Gentleman's answer in regard to Holyrood Palace was satisfactory so far as the future was concerned. He wished, however, to know what was the earliest date when the fees would be abolished?

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said the hon. Member could not go back to that point, as the Amendment had been withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

> "That a sum, not exceeding £70,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. CALDWELL said he did not see why some of the parks in London should be maintained out of the Imperial funds, as in the large towns in the provinces similar parks were provided at the expense of the localities. The maintenance of these parks came to a considerable sum. They had to pay for Kensington Gardens a sum of nearly £5,000, Regent's Park upwards of £7,000, and St. James's, Green, and Hyde Parks £24,000 for maintenance. Comparing the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, he observed that in the latter country all that was provided was a small sum for the Botanical Gardens in Edinburgh, and Holyrood Park. It was argued that people came from the provinces to London and went to such parks as Hyde Park, but they went in like manner to the parks in Paris, and did not in that case have to pay for the privilege. Hyde Park added immensely to the amenity of London, and enhanced the value of the surrounding property. He admitted that an exception might be made in such a case as Kew Gardens, on the ground that it was an institution of a national character. Seeing there was a question of financial relations between England and Scotland pending, it was the duty of Scotch Members to object when they found items in the Estimates in the case of England for which they paid locally in Scotland. The Thames Embankment, instead of being under the control of the London County Council, might just as well be kept up by Imperial funds. The public parks in London ought to be under the control of the London County Council. While the Imperial right of property in Hyde Park and other parks should be maintained, when there was an important body like the London County Council, which had a large revenue and taxpayers who were an unlimited quantity, there was no need for helping London from the Imperial funds. London was not regarded as "necessitous" in regard to another Bill, and if so it was not necessitous in regard to its public parks. It was not a question of the amount of the expenditure, but of who was to bear it. It might be said, "What is the use of protesting. The Government will get the Vote." But continually protesting, ultimately brought about reforms, and he would continue to protest against items being placed in the Estimates which, in the case of the provinces, were paid for by the localities themselves.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he did not agree with the hon. Member, who desired either to abolish Hyde Park cr to remove it to Edinburgh. [Laughter and cries of "No!"] It was not Hyde Park that had made London, but London that had made Hyde Park. Situated where it was, in the centre of the greatest city in the world, it indirectly produced considerable advantages to the rest of the Kingdom, including Scotland. No one would come to these islands to see the Botanic Gardens at Edinburgh, but when they came to see the sights of London they were very likely to go on to Edinburgh, and spend a large sum of money there. [Laughter.] That was how it worked out. So that, even from the Scotchman's point of view, Hyde Park was a national institution, and ought to be kept up at the national expense. He was glad the hon. Member did not extend his animosity to Kew. There was a Vote for £740 for the Botanic Gardens at Edinburgh. That was enough to keep the whole of Scotland in greenstuff for a year. [Laughter.] He would be glad to find Scotchmen coming to Kew, but this £740 were paid to encourage their patriotic desire to remain in their own country. With regard to Hyde Park, the state of the Ride caused many serious accidents. An easy remedy would be to extend the Ride through Kensington Gardens. No one ever used the Avenue there, and this would be the means of extending the Ride two or three miles. It would interfere with no one. Years ago people were allowed to ride through Kensington Gardens northwards. Why the privilege was stopped he did not know. But in view of the increased influx of Scotchmen and other foreigners—[laughter]—into London it was desirable to add to the amenities and the safety of those who went down to the Row on horses. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. F. G. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) sad he desired to confirm what had been said as to the serious accidents that happened through the state of the Ride in Hyde Park. They might be obviated if sand were thrown on the stone pitchings, on which accidents occurred.

Mr. COURTENAY WARNER thought that there would probably be more accidents if the ride were extended as suggested by the hon. Member for Lynn Regis. Many of the people who rode in the Park were not fully masters of their horses, and for these people to be galloping across the roadway would be dangerous. The great majority of the riders in Rotten Row nowadays were not sufficiently ornamental to attract foreigners to London, and he did not think the extension of their privileges would either increase the amenities of London or of Hyde Park.

Sir HENRY HOWORTH said it had been proposed that Kew Gardens should be opened during the forenoon, instead of as now at twelve o'clock, until nightfall. Under pressure from residents in the neighbourhood, it was proposed to open the gardens earlier. He was informed by those who had charge of the Gardens that this would involve great difficulties and expense. The Gardens contained a large number of stoves and greenhouses, and if the public were admitted earlier than at present, it must be under vigilant custody, or every kind of mischief would be done. The greenhouses could not be opened before noon without the attendance of a number of gardeners and others, who were already considerably overworked. Up to noon, the persons chiefly attracted to the gardens were children and nursemaids, who no doubt benefited by the air, but were most dangerous in gardens and greenhouses unless there was proper custody. There was an enormous amount of scientific work done in the Gardens, apart from their being a "show place." In the Gardens and Museum there was a continual influx of scientific men for the purpose of serious study, and it was felt that they must have the use of the Gardens in the early part of the day. The privileges already extended to the public at Kew were ample and most generous.

Mr. WEIR pointed out that there had been an increase in this Vote so far as England was concerned, but the Botanic Gardens at Edinburgh, instead of receiving a larger sum, had actually received £20 less than they did last year. As to the money which was received from persons who had the privilege of letting chairs and selling newspapers in the parks, he should like to know whether tenders were invited for this privilege, or whether it was accorded to the same individual year after year—in other words, whether it was a job? He considered that tenders should always be invited, and that the lettings should prove a source of income. He thought the London County Council should have charge of the parks, and that the rich people of London should pay for their own parks. Poor Scotland, which was already taxed enormously by this country, ought not to be charged anything on this head.

*Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs) called attention to the library at the Botanic Gardens, Edinburgh, which, he said, was still in an elementary condition. The library at Kew was an excellent botanical library, and there were possibly three or four other libraries in London which were all equally perfect. The one in Edinburgh, however, was not sufficiently perfect for the educational requirements of those who attended the courses of lectures at the Royal Botanical Gardens. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, when he was next at Edinburgh, would give some attention to the matter. They were very grateful to him for what he had already done in the way of the extension of buildings at the Gardens, which had been put in a much more satisfactory condition than they had been in hitherto. Of late years the courses of lectures had been much more important both to gardeners and foresters, and the want of a properly equipped library had therefore been very much felt. There was one other point to which he should like to draw attention. He hoped the buildings in connection with Linlithgow Palace would receive the right hon. Gentleman's attention. There had been some repairs carried out which were hardly an ornament to the building. Some of the floors had given way; they had been put up again in part, and some of them had been protected with a layer of pink cement. That was certainly out of keeping with the whole of the buildings. They were very beautiful pattern floors, but whether these remained or had been destroyed, it was quite impossible to tell, because, instead of the stones and tiles they had a layer of this pink cement round the two sides of the main courtyard. Wholly apart from the question of re-roofing the remains of Linlithgow Palace, they ought to have some assurance that the work of repair would be carried on with some regard to the character of the building, and that where such acts of vandalism had been perpetrated as had been the case with these floors from time to time, these errors might be repaired. They all took a great interest in this building, which was perhaps the most beautiful of all of these ancient palaces which remained in Scotland, and care should be taken that it was not lightly interfered with.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) noticed that the expenditure on the Royal Parks had diminished by about £6,000 in the up-keep, which included a great number of parks, in which a vast number of people derived a deal of enjoyment. He should like to hear some defence as to the reduction of the cost, as he thought a great deal more might be done in the London parks than was done at present to increase the pleasure of the people who visited them. There were some works going on at Kensington Gardens in connection with the kiosk there. He saw under the head of "new works" only £50, which obviously would not cover the expenditure that had taken place. Was some private contractor the person to whom the kiosk was let, carrying out the works, and if so, under what sort of arrangement? With regard to Hyde Park there was an expenditure of £1,150, but it did not appear to him to cover the increase which the right hon. Gentleman told them about last year. The kiosk which he mentioned, for instance, had not been put up, and they would like to know if he had changed his mind about it? He further desired to know whether a cinder path might not be made for cyclists in either of these parks and thus greatly add to the pleasures of a large number of people.

*Mr. CHAS. McLAREN (Leicester, Bosworth) on the question of cycling in the parks, asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether he could not hold out some hope of greater facilities being given. He did not go so far as to say that a cinder path was wanted, but it would be an advantage if some alley could be laid out or devoted exclusively to cyclists. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman, who had shown a great deal of sympathy for the claims of cyclists, might distinguish his period of office by further reforms. In any other capital than London the Mall in St. James's Park would be a pleasant resort, instead of being a more or less disagreeable wilderness. There were four broad alleys, one for vehicular traffic; another, asphalted, was used by pedestrians, and two were deserted. Of these cyclists might be allowed to use one; the gravel was well suited for the purpose. There was a special Ride for Members provided in Birdcage Walk, but in these days more Members used the cycle than rode on horseback, and they had an equal claim for accommodation. In Hyde Park cyclists confined themselves largely to one road on the other side of the Serpentine, and it was very unfair to allow that road to be blocked by carriages and horses. The cycle riding in Hyde Park was one of the prettiest sights in London, and people were attracted by it in large numbers. Many ladies rode cycles there, and as people went to see the Row so they went to see the cycles, and some consideration should be shown to ladies who provided this interest for the public. The right hon. Gentleman had made statements with the object of discouraging people from using the road for driving, but these statements were not read by the coachmen who took their families there for an airing. Something more might be done, and if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to do something for them, his efforts would be much appreciated by the cycling world of London.

MR. CALDWELL repeated a question he had formerly put to the late Commissioner of Works, in reference to the refreshment kiosk at Kew. The difficulty was in getting a reasonable tariff for the refreshment supplied. Would the right hon. Gentleman consider the propriety of erecting buildings and letting them for a reasonable term of, say, three years to contractors, keeping some control or attaching some condition to the scale of charges? He made this suggestion in the interest of the many poor visitors to the gardens.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said the hon. Member for Lanark in his first speech took up the financial relations argument, but he trusted it would not be necessary to answer that argument on every Vote. These Royal Parks were maintained at the Imperial charge, and he felt sure there was no desire to see them otherwise than so maintained in a manner worthy of the metropolis of this great country. ["Hear, hear!"] One hon. Member remarked on the cost being too great, but another said he thought that not enough was spent for this purpose. For his own part there was no limit to the amount he would like to spend on the parks, but he was held in check by the Treasury. He must cut his coat according to his cloth, his great ambition being to make the money go as far as possible in rendering the parks more beautiful and enjoyable for the public. He had been asked a question about the Row. As to the extension of the Row round Kensington Gardens, although that might be much desired by the riding public, it would not meet with general acceptance. ["Hear, hear!"] After all, it was but a small section of the population that had the privilege of indulging in horse exercise in the morning. Such an extension would not be popular, and it would be costly. The money could be devoted to better use in connection with the parks. As to the crossing at the top of the Row he had anticipated the wishes of his hon. Friend; he had given directions that the stone crossing should be first chipped and kept sanded, so that horses would be less likely to slip. Upon the Question of opening Kew Gardens earlier in the day he had made careful inquiry, with every desire to open the Gardens as much as possible for the benefit of the public. But he had first to consider that the raison d'etre of the gardens was scientific; they were the centre of botanical research for the whole country. This was the chief justification for the large expenditure upon Kew Gardens. Though residents complained of having to wait until noon, yet they were much more fortunately placed than the inhabitants of other London suburbs, for nowhere was there so much open space near London as in the neighbourhood of Kew and Richmond. Kew Gardens must be recognised as a scientific institution, and there was a general agreement among scientific men that the contention of the director was perfectly reasonable that there would be great difficulty in the way of students and in carrying on the classes if the public generally were admitted. He had heard from Professor Balfour, at Edinburgh, where the gardens were opened earlier, that though he did not wish to go back from the arrangement, he experienced great difficulty in conducting his classes because of the large number of visitors. Therefore, he hoped that gentlemen who lived in the neighbourhood of Kew would be moderate in their demands, and would recognise the value of the gardens for purposes other than the exercise of their children in the morning. The hon. Member for Islington had asked as to the works at the kiosk in Kensington Gardens. They consisted merely of putting a kiosk into better condition, and carrying out some drainage—quite a small matter under the head of general repairs. With regard to the proposed new kiosk in Hyde Park, he admitted that he had not carried out the undertaking he gave, when, with the general approval of the Committee, he took the money for the purpose last year. He had been anxious to have a proper kiosk erected, but he had not been able to arrange with the Ranger a satisfactory site near the band stand. He hoped, however, to make a satisfactory arrangement at a later period. With regard to bicycles in the park, he ventured to differ from the hon. Member for Bosworth as to the picturesque nature of bicycles or bicycle riders. [Laughter.] He did not think any extension in the direction of cinder paths or asphalte paths would tend to beautify the park, and he did not know that those who rode bicycles would lend any additional attraction to the park. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] He had taken some interest in this matter, and had laid down what he thought were reasonable regulations for the admission of bicyclists. It seemed to be thought that they were limited to one road. As a matter of fact, they were allowed to go on any of the roads in the park from the moment it was open till 12 o'clock. The cyclists' original request was that they should be allowed to use the roads in the park up to 10 o'clock in the morning. Shortly after that permission had been given the Ranger extended it, to meet their views, up to any hour in the forenoon that the First Commissioner liked to adopt. He (the First Commissioner) named the hour of 12, and he was bound to say that he had not found sufficient support to justify him in again approaching the Ranger and asking him to extend the hours further. He certainly did not feel inclined to take into his consideration at all any question of making cinder or asphalte paths in the park for this purpose. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member also suggested that bicycles should be allowed on one of the tracks in the Mall. That opened up rather a larger question than the hon. Member had in his mind. At the present moment, he believed he was right in saying the law of the land was that no bicycle might go on a footway. These tracks in the Mall were footways, except that the Commissioner of Police might turn carriages down them on the occasion of a Drawing Room, and he did not think it would be worth departing from the law of the land in order to enable bicyclists to ride down them. ["Hear, hear!"] With regard to the question which the hon. Member opposite asked him about Linlithgow, he ventured to think that the improvements, which were begun in the time of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, were of a very important character. He was not prepared to admit the terms of reproach which the hon. Member applied to them. A great deal of attention had been paid to Linlithgow both by the right hon. Gentleman opposite and by himself, and they had taken money in the last few years for the purpose. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman in his appreciation of one of the most magnificent buildings they had in Scotland, and it certainly would be his endeavour to keep it, as far as he could, in the best possible repair. It was a magnificent ruin in its present state, and he ventured to think it would be a very great mistake to attempt any modern restoration. If they did they would probably have a similar result as they had some years ago at Holyrood, where, in an endeavour to put a new roof on the old walls, they came down altogether. The hon. Member for Mid Lanark asked him about the refreshment kiosk at Kew. He had not heard recently of any complaint of the kind. He had himself constantly visited Kew, and had enjoyed the advantage of the kiosk. If the hon. Gentleman wished to see how excellent the food was and how cheap, he would recommend that he should spend some of his Easter holidays in visiting Kew and testing the quality of its refreshments. [Laughter.] In answer to the hon. Member for Lynn Regis, he had to say that the Ranger of Hyde Park, who received no pay whatever for being Ranger, had no power with regard to the general management of the landscape gardens, though he maintained a nominal control. The Bailiff of the Parks had a salary, and he (Colonel Wheatley) was one of the best servants whom the State had at the present moment, and it was largely to his energy, ability and skill that they owed the very great improvements which they had seen in the park. He was entirely under the control of the First Commissioner of Works, and not under the control of the Ranger. In answer to the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, he had to say that when he came into office he found that no charge had been made for the right of letting chairs in Hyde Park. He at once gave instructions that they should seek for a more satisfactory arrangement, and the result was that he obtained from the persons who had the privilege the sum of £1,000 a year. ["Hear, hear!"] With that money he had been able to pay the bands, which performed, he thought, to the satisfaction of everyone in the Park.

Mr. JOHN BURNS (Battersea) said he had heard with sincere regret the reply the right hon. Gentleman had made with regard to the opening of Kew Gardens. He would like to put before him another view of this matter, and he hoped he should have the support of the Colonial Secretary. They were likely to have this year what was termed a foregathering of English-speaking people from all parts of the world, and he asked that Kew Gardens should be opened, if for this year only, earlier in the day than they were now, so as to prevent parties of Colonial visitors, Americans, Frenchmen, and Germans, who went down to Kew early in the morning, being obliged either to kick their heels at the riverside until the gardens opened at 12 o'clock, or to leave without the opportunity of seeing the gardens at all. He believed that was an injustice to people who came to London, and that the scientific training and education could be carried on without interfering with the admission of such visitors. There was no reason why the gardens should not be opened at 10 o'clock, and the gatekeeper might have some discretionary power as to the admission of people. He did not believe what the professors said with regard to the teaching of their classes if the public were admitted. If artistic education could be carried on as it was in the museums under these circumstances, he saw no reason why it could not be done at Kew Gardens. It was absurd to suppose that, owing to pure cussedness on the part of the permanent officials, who wished that the students should have privacy, this magnificent public institution should be closed until 12 o'clock in the day.

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. J. Chamberlain, Birmingham, W.) said the hon. Gentleman had appealed to him, as Colonial Secretary, to support him in his attack on the administration of Kew Gardens.

Mr. BURNS said that, on the contrary, he asked the Colonial Secretary to support him in his request that Kew Gardens should be opened earlier in the day, so that colonial visitors, together with Americans and others, should not suffer inconvenience through the gardens being opened so late.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN did not see the object of the interruption. The hon. Gentleman sat down having just appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to protest against the pigheadedness of those who were administering Kew Gardens.

Mr. J. BURNS: Pure cussedness.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Pure cussedness! That was, perhaps, worse. [A laugh.] Cussedness implied some control, whereas a man might be born pigheaded. [Renewed laughter.] But he rose, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's appeal to join him in his attack upon the administration of Kew Gardens. The hon. Gentleman had appealed to him as Colonial Secretary only, but he might have appealed to him as a very enthusiastic horticulturist, for he could certainly say that to him gardening was even a greater delight than politics themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member had failed to realise the peculiar position in which Kew Gardens stood; he treated them as if they existed for the benefit of the inhabitants of Kew. That was not the proper merit or claim the gardens had upon the support of the Committee, but it was as a great scientific establishment. We were very justly proud of the gardens. He had seen almost every botanical garden in Europe, and he thought he was right in saying there was nothing in the whole of Europe which could hold the candle to Kew. [" Hear, hear ! "] He was not speaking as to the decoration of the gardens, but as to their scientific value. [" Hear, hear ! "] The hon. Gentleman said that French and German people had to wait outside the gates, having got there before the time of opening; and he complained of the cussedness of officials because they did not open the gates before the proper time. That was really a little too absurd. If one went at 11 o'clock to an institution in France which opened at 12 o'clock, that was his pigheadedness, and not the pigheadedness of the officials who kept the doors closed. [Laughter.] There was nothing peculiar in Kew Gardens opening at 12 o'clock. A great number of foreign institutions opened at 12 o'clock, and some did not open until late in the afternoon. It was, of course, the business of Frenchmen and Germans to be at Kew Gardens at the proper time and not before. [A laugh.] But the point was that if they opened the gardens at the time his hon. Friend desired they should be opened they would most materially interfere with their value as a scientific institution—[" hear, hear ! "]—and they would interfere with the work of the officials. In his capacity as Colonial Secretary he was continually applying to Kew in reference to the cultivation of all kinds of plants, and he did not hesitate to say that some of the great improvements made in the Mauritius and some of the West Indian Islands were due almost entirely to the advice and assistance received from the Kew officials—[" hear, hear ! "]—the gentlemen whom the hon. Member had described as pigheaded or cussed. It was not fair to attack public servants who were really performing useful duty, and it was not fair to throw on them, for the benefit of children and nurserymaids and Frenchmen and Germans, duties which would depreciate from their value as advisers of the colonial and other officers of the Government, who might from time to time have occasion to apply for their services. He thought that on consideration the Committee would see that the public were sufficiently provided for when the gardens were opened, as now, every weekday at 12 o'clock and on Sunday afternoon, which was, after all, the most popular time, and when Kew was visited by the largest number of people. [" Hear, hear ! "]

MR. LOUGH moved to reduce the Vote by £110. He said the hon. Member for Battersea did not get much sympathy from the Colonial Secretary. The right hon. Gentleman might surely have dealt more kindly with the hon. Gentleman. Certainly if the Estimates were to be discussed in the spirit which the right hon. Gentleman had displayed, there would not be the same progress with them in the future as there had been in the past. But he rose particularly to refer to the treatment the First Commissioner of Works had received from the Ranger of Hyde Park in respect to the kiosk it had been decided to erect there. Last year they voted money for the kiosk, but now they were told the First Commissioner of Works could not carry out his wishes because of the action of the Ranger of the park, for whom, as Ranger of Richmond Park, a sum was taken in this Vote. The erection of the kiosk was prevented because the Ranger would not give the site the First Commissioner desired to have. The Committee ought, he thought, to protest against the interference of the Ranger in the matter, and as a means of making a protest he moved to reduce the Vote by £110.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that in all the negotiations he had had with the Ranger for two years he had found his Royal Highness anxious to meet his wishes and those of the public. He did not desire the House to understand that there were any difficulties placed in his way except as to a particular site.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said a year was a long time for coming to an arrangement as to a site in a restricted area. There were many possible sites, and he should like to know whether there was any prospect of an arrangement being arrived at? If there was none, then he thought the House should know. He thought they might ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there was a prospect of an early agreement?

Mr. BURNS joined in the point raised by the Member for Islington. The public were in favour of this kiosk; there was, in fact, only one person who objected to it, and he thought if they applied sufficient pressure they could induce every Ranger to climb down easily, and sometimes quickly. It should not take more than three months to build the kiosk; and he instanced a building operation in Battersea Park by the County Council as an example to the right hon. Gentleman. The fact was, they had no control over some of the expenditure on Royal Parks and Gardens.

Mr. WARNER did not want to see any additional buildings in Hyde Park, and sincerely hoped they would be kept out. He thought that if any kiosk was put up it would take away from the rural aspect of the park. He thought that public opinion would back up the Ranger.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said this kiosk was for the comfort of thousands who could there get refreshments and shelter, and he considered that it would add considerably to the attractions of the park.

Mr. CALDWELL said a very important question was here involved. Did the Ranger manage the park, or the House of Commons, which provided all the money for the maintenance of the parks? He knew of no constitutional reason why the Ranger should arrogate to himself a power greater than that of the House of Commons in dealing with the Royal Parks. In this action of the Committee there was no reflection cast on the First Commissioner, but they wished to give expression to their feelings on the matter.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 52; Noes, 144.—(Division List, No. 169.)

Mr. J. BURNS said that, notwithstanding the adverse criticism which his suggestion had met with in a very high quarter, he again rose to press it upon the First Commissioner of Works. In doing so he would say that a taste for horticulture and a love of orchids did not beget either the scientific or an impartial mind on small matters of administration. Certainly it did not beget a knowledge of the facts with regard to Kew Gardens. His anxiety was not for the residents around Kew Gardens, but for the visitors, who at present were prevented from using them either for pleasure or for scientific purposes before twelve o'clock. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken with much cocksureness about what took place in Continental capitals; but if he made inquiry he would find that similar gardens and institutions in Berlin, Vienna and Paris were open earlier than twelve, or even ten, o'clock in the day. It was ridiculous to say that earlier opening would necessitate a double staff. The men started work at six or seven o'clock in the morning, and most of the staff was at work between the hours of eight and eleven o'clock. London, the hon. Member proceeded, was swarming with polytechnics, where large numbers of young men and young women attended classes for botany and kindred subjects. Very frequently it happened that the only time teachers could take their students to the gardens was between ten and twelve o'clock in the morning; and under this antiquated rule they would be refused access. By admitting these students they would be carrying out the real object of Kew Gardens as a scientific institution. There was no reason why it should not be done. He denied that he had attacked the permanent officials. They were paid to do their work, and he maintained the right of the House to criticise the administration of any public institution on which public money was spent. He would not follow the Colonial Secretary either in the bad taste or in the ungentlemanly temper which he displayed.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I do not think that is a proper expression to use.

Mr. BURNS: Well, I will not use it. When an hon. Member made suggestions which were worthy of consideration, he ought not to be told that he was making attacks on public officials.

Mr. HERBERT GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.) said that his hon. Friend was fully justified in bringing this point before the notice of the Committee. It was desirable to extend the privilege of visiting Kew Gardens to as many people as possible; but the question was not so simple as his hon. Friend supposed. Of course, sometimes, when pressure of this kind was brought to bear on public offices, a way was found to meet the suggestions that were made. But as to this matter, he had gone into it fully when he was First Commissioner of Works, and he found that when the Gardens were opened on Bank Holidays at an earlier hour than twelve, comparatively few people availed themselves of the privilege. He did not think that sufficient advantage would result from this arrangement to balance the extra cost which would be involved. But it might be possible to give more facilities to societies and students to visit the Gardens under special permission. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that there could be no doubt that arrangements might be made in that direction. He had made special inquiries, and found that anyone wishing to visit the Gardens early for scientific purposes was never refused admision. If institutions, such as the hon. Member for Battersea had mentioned, wished for the purposes of study to visit the Gardens, he was sure that they would be admitted, and more than that, he would take care that they should be admitted. [Cheers.]

Mr. BURNS said that he was much obliged for the courteous and valuable concession which the right hon. Gentleman had made.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: It is not a concession, because the privilege is granted already.

Mr. BURNS said that there were 30 or 40 polytechnics and similar institutions from which classes, under charge of teachers, would like to visit the Gardens, sometimes on Wednesday mornings, but generally on Saturday mornings. As the London School Board gave marks both to teachers and scholars for visiting public institutions in classes, he hoped that such classes would be given the same privilege as the polytechnic classes. If the Gardens could be opened to them at 10, a great convenience would be accorded, and the work of the gardeners would not be interfered with.

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) said that he had consistently spoken for 11 years on this question, and had succeeded in obtaining certain advantages for the English people. The First Commissioner tried to meet every suggestion in a kind spirit, and he wished, for the sake of the country, that all Government Departments were conducted in the same spirit. It was always easy to approach the First Commissioner of Works. The refreshment kiosk at Kew—which Lord Rathmore, when First Commissioner had described as "Tanner's kiosk"—did not give sufficient accommodation to the people. He had seen many turned away; and, furthermore, the waiters were all Germans. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to see that the tea kiosk in the Gardens was enlarged; and if he could not get all Irish waiters, to put on a few English, and, at all events, to see that they were not all Germans.

Mr. CALDWELL said that the Auditor General in his last Report called attention to the fact that no inventory of tools was kept in the various parks; and that no uniform plan was kept for checking and issuing the return of implements. He thought those matters should be attended to.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS thought there was a system of satisfactory inventories kept, but he would look into the matter himself.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed,—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £23,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the Houses of Parliament Building."

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES objected to the tiles of the Lobby and Central Hall. In the first place they were of a bilious yellow colour, which was enough to drive an hysterical man to violence, and in the next place they were so extremely slippery that it was dangerous to walk upon them. [Laughter.] In fact, he often thought they must have been put down by the junior Members of the Government who were desirous of creating vacancies in the Cabinet. [Laughter.] He suggested that stone pavements should be substituted for the tiles.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) was glad to notice that a beginning was about to be made to fill up the three vacant panels in the Central Hall with mosaics, in harmony with the fourth panel of St. George. He wished to know whether there were any cartoons or paintings in the possession of the Office of Works from which mosaics could be constructed for those panels? He understood that Sir Edward Poynter, the President of the Royal Academy, who prepared the design of St. George, had provided another design, and that two others had been provided by Mr. Albert Moore. He also hoped that attention would continue to be paid to the frescoes in the Houses. The late Commissioner of Works, carrying out another old suggestion of his, had called in the highest authority in the world on the subject of frescoes, Professor Church, who very handsomely agreed to gratuitously look after the frescoes, and everyone who recollected what the condition of the pictures was before the Professor took them in hand must admit that they had been most successfully renovated. Professor Church presented a Report, in which he described his method of work, and said he was prepared, if invited, to continue his benevolent care of the pictures. The House and the country, therefore, owed a debt of gratitude to Professor Church. He should like to know whether it was intended to put up in the Central Hall another statue to Mr. Bright. Mr. Gilbert's statue was a great artistic work, but it was not an adequate representation of Mr. Bright as he was known in the House; and it would be a pity if there was to be no statue of that great Statesman at Westminster.

Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devonshire, Tavistock) suggested that Members should have one room for reading or writing in which some other than the electric light was used.

Mr. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton) explained the circumstances under which the panels in the central hall had remained empty so long. When first the arrangement was made by which certain panels were filled, it was decided they should all be filled in the same way, with glass mosaic work. The then Chief Commissioner of Works was interested in a manufactory at Venice where these mosaics were made, and it was therefore assumed that he had some pecuniary interest in the matter, but the fact was he simply took a great interest in art, and he really had no monetary interest in it at all, and was simply spending money there with a view to art. They were only carrying out the original intention if now they proceeded to fill up these panels. He rose more particularly, however, to plead the cause of the smokers. The Chief Commissioner had done all he could to help them, but his efforts so far had not been very successful. Most unquestionably the present smoking room was very inadequate as regarded accommodation, and the atmosphere was not precisely what could be wished for in a smoking room. It had been suggested that the quadrangle should be covered over and utilised for the purpose. This, however, was a proposal which would always be resisted by the Government Whips, because if hon. Members managed to slip down on the plea that they were going to the smoking room, in all probability they would forget the duty they owed to their country and Party, and slip out of the House entirely. He pleaded for better accommodation for the smokers. He believed the business of the House would hardly be carried on if it was not for the smoking room. They would have everybody crowding the Chamber, and, as Satan found some work for idle hands to do, so also he found some work for idle mouths to do. They would double the talking if they had not a smoking room. [Laughter.] Then the temper and irritation would also be doubled if it were not for the soothing, calming effect of nicotine on the Members. If he was horrified by something said on the other side his first impulse was to protest, but what did he do? He went to the smoking room, lit a cigarette, and came back perfectly calm.

Sir H. HOWORTH wished to say a word on behalf of another class, namely, the tea drinkers, who ought to have a room better suited to their needs, providing larger accommodation. If possible, they should also secure better accommodation for newspaper readers. In both those respects the present accommodation was small and inadequate.

Mr. LOUGH complained of the bad ventilation of some of the large committee rooms, and the stifling atmosphere in them, and asked why they should not all be ventilated by having a fan erected? He hoped the telegraphic communication of the speakers in the House would be extended to all the rooms. One item he strongly protested against, and that was the sum of £200 for extending the bookcases along the library corridor. These bookcases were the greatest disfigurement that existed in the House. They should be all removed, and their places occupied by pretty statues or pictures.

MR. BURNS called attention to the expenditure of £750 for panel decoration in the central Lobby, and asked whether the other three panels were to be in keeping with the panel already completed? If the panels were to be completed in mosaic, he suggested that the example of the method of decoration followed in St. Paul's Cathedral ought to be followed, instead of the flat Italian mosaic. He also appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to make an effort to keep together the small school of English mosaic craftsmen who had been employed at St. Paul's Cathedral. The work there had been carried out by a City firm, and by English designers and workmen, in a very creditable way, and he hoped these workmen would have an opportunity of showing their skill in the completion of the three panels in the outside Lobby.

DR. TANNER called attention to the completion of the decoration of panels, the construction of a glass awning outside the Speaker's house, and the formation of a new doorway to the terrace. He complained that the terrace was made a kind of show place, where a large number of ladies walked up and down blocking the gangways to the free egress and ingress of Members. The terrace, indeed, was a place for afternoon tea, a society parade, instead of being a place where hon. Members could take a small outing.

MR. WEIR complained of the ventilation of the House, and described the atmosphere in the Chamber as poisonous. Sewer air permeated the Chamber and the Committee Rooms, the Reporters' Gallery, and the Ladies' Gallery. He also wanted to know whether the House was supplied with water, especially the dining room, from the artesian well, or whether it was a mixture of Thames water and artesian water. He personally preferred good water to whisky.

DR. FARQUHARSON protested against the strictures that had been passed on the ventilation of the House, which was probably the best ventilated Chamber in the world. No sewer gas could penetrate into it, and the building was now, he believed, absolutely free from any pernicious ingredient.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS called attention to the question of warming the House when there were all-night sittings. During very late sittings, when human vitality was at its lowest, the heating apparatus invariably ceased to act, with the result that the House became quite cold. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would pay special attention to the desirability of warming the House during late sittings. In some parts of the House there was, perhaps, more than adequate ventilation, for he had heard several Members complain that they had suffered from something like rheumatism in the feet in consequence of the excessive ventilation under the seats. But as far as the freshness of air was concerned, he doubted whether any better ventilated building could be found. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the extension of the telegraph indicator to the dining-room and library. He noticed that there was an item of £1,000 for furnishing the residence of the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod. Was it customary to refurnish the residence of that official, or had a new residence been assigned to the present holder of the office? There was another matter requiring attention, now that the South African Committee was sitting. There had been some peculiar proceedings, and some witnesses had actually refused to answer questions put to them. If it should become the duty of the Committee, he presumed that they would take notice of contumacy of that kind. In these circumstances the apartment in the Clock Tower would be called into requisition, and he wished to be told whether that apartment was in readiness for the reception of gentlemen who were apparently determined to go there? Was the room quite near the clock?

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The hon. Member is misinformed. It is only Members of the House who are committed to the Clock Tower. [A laugh.]

MR. LEWIS hoped the time was far distant when a Member of the House might have to go there, and was glad to learn that a humbler residence was assigned to persons who refused to answer the questions of a Committee.

MR. CALDWELL complained that when the House of Lords was in vacation, Members of the House of Commons who wished to show the Peers' Chamber to their friends were prevented from doing so. He had himself experienced this, and when he asked for an explanation was told that he and his friends could not be shown the chambers of the Upper House because they were not in charge of the First Commissioner of Works. He thought this was carrying matters rather far. It was absurd that visitors who were accompanied by Members of the House of Commons should not be allowed to see the magnificent Chamber where the Peers assembled. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would be able to arrange for the removal of this unreasonable restriction.

Mr. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) observed that the hon. Member for the Flint Boroughs appeared to anticipate that late sittings would become the normal state of things. For his part, he trusted that they would be rare. In connection with the subject of ventilation which had been raised, he wished to say that personally he often suffered from too great an abundance of air, especially in the Division Lobbies and Library, in the summer months. During the summer season it was almost impossible to find any part of the House that was free from draughts in certain states of the weather. Fresh air was introduced in a line with the person, and windows were constantly being opened, without regard to the quarter whence the wind blew, or to the temperature. He hoped that something would be done to remedy the existing state of things.

Dr. TANNER referred to the possibility of filtering fog, if necessary, through masses of cotton wool. As regarded ventilation, the floor of the House had been kept perfectly clear, so that the draught might come up; but he thought it was desirable for hon. Members to wipe their boots before walking up the floor of the House, lest particles of dirt should be carried by the draught into the atmosphere they breathed.

Mr. J. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston) asked if the right hon. Gentleman would take care that the furniture and articles of that sort which were purchased should be as far as possible of British manufacture?

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said with regard to the item for the panels in the central Lobby, there was a misprint in the Estimates. The sum asked for was not "for the completion," but "towards the completion" of the decoration. He was afraid it would not be possible to complete those panels for the sum of money on the Estimates—namely, £750. As to the designs, there were in the South Kensington Museum, on loan from the Office of Works, two water-colour designs of the late Mr. Albert Moore for two of the panels of the central hall, and there was also a sketch which Sir Edward Poynter had prepared. They had not got very far with the matter yet, but it was his intention to send for the designs of Mr. Albert Moore, and if this money were voted they would consider how far they could utilise these designs and that of Sir Edward Poynter. He was entirely in sympathy with the hon. Member for Battersea with regard to the class of work which had been done in St. Paul's Cathedral. He had seen it on several occasions, and watched it carefully, with a view to seeing how far it was applicable to the building. He ventured to say that the class of work might be very well adopted in that House, and he proposed to give his attention in that direction. ["Hear, hear!"] The item of £100 for repairing frescoes, to which the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire had called attention, was a sum which ought to have been spent last year in restoring certain frescoes which Professor Church had taken in hand. He believed it was the fact that this work could not be carried out in certain conditions of the atmosphere, and, consequently, it had had to be postponed. He would like to express the great obligation which the Government were under to Professor Church for the profound skill he had shown in doing this very practical work, and for placing his services gratuitously at their disposal. With regard to the question of the Bright statue, nothing, so far as he knew, had been done further in the matter. The House would remember that the statue which was placed in the Central Hall last year was placed there by a Committee, but it was found that the statue was so out of keeping with the general desire of the House that, after a good deal of negotiation, it was removed. No approach had officially been made to him to put another statue in its place, but he had no objections—in fact, he should be glad to find accommodation in the building for a representation of Mr. Bright. ["Hear, hear!"] In future, however, some steps ought to be taken to see these works of art before they pledged themselves to admit them within their portals. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Northampton had raised the question, very familiar to most of them, of the want of smoking-room accommodation. He was perfectly ready to admit that it was a well-founded complaint, as the smoking tendencies among Members were very much greater, no doubt, than they were in days gone by. In addition to that they wanted more tea-room and newspaper-room accommodation, but he did not quite see how they could get it. He had made the suggestion last year that one of the court-yards should be roofed in, and extra accommodation provided in that way, but he admitted that the suggestion was open to objections. He did not think the objections were very serious, however, but he thought they could not go in for so large a proposal without much more consideration. He was now in correspondence with the officials of the other House in regard to some small accommodation which had become vacant through the resignation of the late librarian, and it might be possible by this means to provide another room, though he could not pledge himself to that as yet. In regard to the question of bookcases in the corridor, he pointed out that a great deal of extra space for books was required. The hon. Member for Cork criticised the cost of the awning over the entrance to the Speaker's house. But the awning was an improvement, desired not only by the Speaker, but by very many of his guests at dinners and levées. He himself was not aware that the estimate was excessive, or compared unfavourably with what the hon. Member said was the cost of the previous awning. During the Easter recess every effort would be made by temporary expedients to improve the ventilation of the Committee rooms. During the autumn recess of 1895-96 the ventilation of the House itself was fully considered. It was found that, in certain respects, it needed improvement, and arrangements were made which rendered it impossible for any foul air to enter the House. He hoped there would be no all-night sittings this Session, but whenever there was an all-night sitting, directions had been given that the House should be properly heated in the early hours of the morning, when one's vitality was always lowest. As to the admission of strangers to the terrace, he had suggested, beside an alteration in the rules as to the number of ladies each Member might introduce, that ladies should be asked to go direct to the terrace by the carriage entrance, or else through the outer Lobby, that the central Lobby and central staircase might not be blocked, as had often been the case when there were large numbers of visitors on busy nights. He would endeavour to ascertain the rules as to the admission of visitors to the House of Lords during the recess, and to obtain for the hon. Member for Hackney the information he desired.

After the usual interval, the Chair was taken by Mr. Grant Lawson.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth) said that he was rather disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman could not give them a little more encouragement with regard to a statue of Mr. John Bright. He had seen it stated that the family of Mr. Bright were prepared to give a statue or a bust, and he hoped it might be possible to utilise the offer in a proper way. He thought it would be a great satisfaction if they could have some memorial of Mr. Bright in that House. There was no party feeling in the matter, for that great statesman was appreciated not only on that side of the House, but equally by hon. Gentlemen opposite. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said the hon. Baronet would recognise that this matter did not really rest in his hands. It was not as though the statue which had been removed had been put up by the Government. It was put up by a Committee, but it proved so distasteful to Members generally that, acting as their mouthpiece, he represented to the Committee that the feeling of the House was outraged by having so bad a statue of a statesman whom they wished to honour, and it was withdrawn. ["Hear, hear!"] Since that time no representations had been made to him officially that it was the desire of any section of the public that a statue of Mr. Bright should be placed in the House. He did happen to know privately that the family of Mr. Bright were anxious that a statue of their father should be placed in the House, but he thought the hon. Baronet would recognise that he must have something further to go upon than that before he could give assent on the part of the Government. He had no desire to keep out a representation of so distinguished a statesman.

Dr. TANNER moved "That Item A (New Works, Etc.), be reduced by £150, in respect of the formation of a new door to the Terrace." He would not say one word against the fair sex, but he thought the large number of ladies who were allowed to walk up and down the terrace was making the House unpopular with a certain section.

Mr. CALDWELL said he had a good deal of sympathy with the proposed reduction. In the normal condition of affairs, the present access to the terrace was quite sufficient, but during the last two years there had been an inroad on the terrace not altogether compatible with the position of that House as a Legislative Assembly. What they wanted was to make that building as effective, as efficient, and as comfortable as possible for its purposes as a Legislative Assembly, and not as a restaurant.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS hoped that the First Commissioner of Works would take steps towards the erection of a statue of the late Mr. Bright. He was confident that upon inquiry the right hon. Gentleman would find that hon. Gentlemen in every quarter of the House were just as anxious that there should be some statue of the late statesman placed in the building as they were to get rid of the very inadequate representation of him which was put in the Lobby some time ago. ["Hear, hear!"]

Dr. TANNER could not understand why, in addition to the £1,000 allowed them, the Kitchen Committee should want £350. They had exceptional advantages, and in order to elicit from the Government an account of the expenditure, he moved "That item G (maintenance of refreshment plant, House of Commons), be reduced by £10."

Amendment put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

6. £25,000, to complete the sum for the Admiralty, Extension of Buildings.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS asked what was the cause of the enormous increase between the original and revised Estimate?

*Sir JOHN LENG (Dundee) wished to know whether the extension of the Admiralty buildings was to be in continuation of the same style of architecture as prevailed at present? He did not know the technical name of that architecture, but thought it was altogether unworthy of public buildings intended for Government offices of a permanent character. They had one example of it in New Scotland Yard. He thought brick was a very good material in some places—when, for example, it was the chief material for the exterior of a building. But it seemed to him that it was altogether incongruous in those buildings which were composed to a considerable extent of stone, and taken altogether were very puny and insignificant, and lacking in anything of an impressive and imposing character. Anyone who travelled through the capitals of Europe must be impressed with the dignity and stateliness of their Government buildings. Capitals very much smaller than this Metropolis—capitals of countries with nothing like the wealth of this country—had buildings which impressed one as being worthy of Royal and Imperial capitals. But this new mongrel style of architecture was, he thought, unworthy of the position in which it was placed, and he had risen to protest against it. He hoped that, in the new block of buildings about to be erected adjacent to the Palace of Westminster, care would be taken that they would be worthy of the position in which they were to be placed. He was not one who sympathised with a cheeseparing policy in regard to the edifices that were intended or ought to last for centuries. Seeing how much this country was now frequented by visitors from foreign states and colonial dependencies, he hoped that edifices would be erected in this Metropolis which would be superior to those in their own capitals. What, he thought, must be obvious to many hon. Members, was that the provincial cities and towns of this country were setting an example to the Metropolis instead of the Metropolis setting an example to them. The town halls in cities such as Glasgow, Leeds and Liverpool, and the one which was about to be opened in a few weeks by Her Majesty in Sheffield, were, with regard to their size, stateliness, grandeur and internal arrangements, far superior to the great majority of modern Government erections in this Metropolis. Instead of going back from the relatively noble style of the Foreign Office to this decadence in the Admiralty Office, he hoped that the First Commissioner of Works, and the heads of the other Government Departments who were interested in the new edifices which would be shortly erected, would endeavour to make them worthy of this great Metropolis. He presumed that these extensions must, for the sake of consistency and congruity, accord with the present buildings, but he thought the style was altogether unworthy of the position they occupied, and he hoped that, so far as future structures were concerned, the example set in the Foreign Office and the Treasury Buildings on the west side of Parliament Street would be followed, and that Parliament Street would be so completed as to make one proud of the buildings therein erected.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that the increased expenditure this year as compared with last year was accounted for by more work. As to the point raised by the hon. Member for Dundee, he could not say that he did not, to a certain extent, agree with him; but he must say that it was most unfair for hon. Members to judge the whole of the new Admiralty building by the one new wing. It was only a portion of a large scheme. They might as well judge Chelsea Hospital buildings by one small wing.

Vote agreed to.

7. £39,000, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Buildings, Great Britain.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS pointed out that the country was still paying for the maintenance of the London Police Courts, as of old. Why should the country maintain the London Courts? Towns like Liverpool and Manchester maintained their own police courts, and why should they be taxed in addition for the London Police Courts? He awaited with some interest the answer which the right hon. Gentleman would give to the House on this question. Were the Government going to take some action in the matter?

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said he certainly did hope that this item would not have appeared this year, but a Bill had been introduced, and it was on the Paper for Monday next. He was afraid it would not then be reached, but the intention was that the Bill should be proceeded with, and that the cost of these Courts should be transferred in the way suggested.

Mr. CALDWELL said the Police Courts of the country had to be provided out of the rates. [Cries of "Agreed!"] Of course, he could understand London Members crying out agreed. They thought they could go to a division, beat those who protested, and that then there would be nothing more said about it. [An hon. Member: "That is the ordinary way."] In the end, however, the protest raised from year to year would lead to a reform. They could get nothing in the House unless they pressed for it. They held that there was no reason why London should be treated in a different manner from the rest of the United Kingdom. They had objected, on the question of financial relations, that such London charges as these were thrown on the Imperial Estimates. They knew nothing about the Bill referred to, and he was entitled to ask the First Commissioner of Works how he proposed to do away with this anomaly? How was he going to remove these sums from the Imperial Estimates? How were they going to provide for these buildings in future, whereby London would be placed in the same position as the rest of the United Kingdom? Nobody knew better than those in charge of the Bill that it was intended to make no difference. It would be a mere transfer to bring about the same result.

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said that for years he had advocated that this charge should be borne by the locality, and he understood that it was in consequence of what he said in the last Parliament, that the Bill had now been brought in by the Government.

Mr. CALDWELL said he had raised the question in the Parliament before last.

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston) said he noticed that there was an item in the Vote for the acquisition of a site for the new County Court at Birmingham, and he would like to know how far that matter had proceeded, and exactly what the town of Birmingham might expect with reference to the new County Court? He thought the old County Court buildings were the ugliest they had in the town. The only building to compare with it for ugliness was the old Post Office, which was now used as the Revenue Office. He sincerely hoped that, in erecting a new County Court, the Government would take care that the best street in Birmingham was not disfigured by the erection of a building of the same architectural ugliness as the present County Court, and that it would contain accommodation sufficient for many years to come. He hoped when the site was acquired it would be in a good position, and that they would have a handsome building, sufficiently large and capable of extension. If this were done, they would not have these repeated requests for renewing buildings within the space of a quarter of a century.

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that the original proposal was to buy a piece of land adjoining the County Court at Birmingham, and on it to build additional offices for the County Court and the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy, who, he believed, was now in hired premises. But unfortunately the land immediately adjoining was recently let by the Corporation, and the present occupier required so much compensation that they were unable to deal with him. They had, therefore, thought it desirable to proceed in another direction. He trusted that, should a building ultimately be erected, it would be worthy of Birmingham, and he would take care that when they came to the question of plans, the authorities of Birmingham would be acquainted with their intentions.

Vote agreed to.

8. £16,000 to complete the sum for Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain.

Mr. LOUGH pointed out that the Vote was decreasing year by year. The policy of the Government seemed to be to pinch and squeeze everything connected with South Kensington to the lowest possible point. He hoped the Committee would have an assurance that steps would be taken as soon as possible to complete the buildings there. A proposal had been made that if the money necessary to provide a proper building for the housing of the valuable collections at South Kensington could not be found at once, it might be raised by loan. The Vote was this year reduced by an amount that would meet the interest on a very substantial part of the sum required. The Government were treating the matter shamefully. Everybody was agreed that this was a most pressing question.

Mr. BARTLEY said that when the question of the shameful condition of South Kensington Museum was raised four or five years ago, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouthshire, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, promised that in the following year he would give a Vote to begin the work of completing the building, but when the time came for the right hon. Gentleman to fulfil his promise, he stated that the public demands on the Exchequer were so great that he could not do it. He noticed that the Government were paying as much as £4,500 a year for the hire of temporary premises in which to place portions of the collection. As money could now be raised by the Exchequer at 2½ per cent., a sum of nearly a quarter of a million could be obtained for the building without any addition to taxation for the £4,500 a year now paid for inferior premises. He thought the Government ought to raise the necessary money in that way, and spread its repayment over a series of years. It certainly was a scandal that the buildings which had been inaugurated by the Prince Consort should be left in such a disgraceful condition in the jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said that for many a long year he had been endeavouring to impress upon Government after Government the necessity for doing justice to the South Kensington Museum. It was greatly to be regretted that a mistaken economy on the part of the Treasury prevented the completion of the building. It was a misfortune to science and art, and a scandal to the administration of the public affairs of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] Noble work had been done in Lancashire and Yorkshire in providing splendid buildings for similar scientific and artistic collections without any appeal to the public purse, and it was to be regretted that the State should be so laggard and niggardly when local communities were so forward and liberal in the cause of technical education. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. BURNS said that the Government had appointed a Committee to inquire not only as to the administration, but the completion of the housing of South Kensington Museum; and he thought that pending the report of that Committee, the Government would be unwise in spending a single sovereign on South Kensington. But he would make one suggestion. South Kensington was paying £4,400 a year for the rent of certain galleries in Exhibition Road previously connected with the Imperial Institute. This charge ought to cease; and it could be put an end to if the Government had the courage to approach the Queen and ask that the Imperial Institute—which had not proved a success for its particular purposes—should, together with these external galleries, be handed over to the South Kensington authorities to accommodate that large collection of objects which were seeking room. The rent which South Kensington paid for the galleries simply kept the Imperial Institute on its legs. He believed that Her Majesty would respond to the petition, and he knew of no better way of celebrating the jubilee than by clearing out all those snobs and "Johnnies" who had not secured the knighthoods and baronetcies which they expected to get out of the Imperial Institute. The extraordinary genius of Sir Somers Vine had not made a success of the Institute, which was the laughing-stock of the West End of London, and the envy of every South Kensington official.

Mr. CALDWELL said that he had no objection to the money being spent on what were national buildings; but he wished to make a claim for Scotland, which received very little under this Vote. Some arrangement might be made to increase the building accommodation of the Edinburgh Museum, so that more loan exhibits might be sent down from the British and South Kensington Museums. It was no longer held that the contents of a museum should be fixed and invariable; and the interest of the Edinburgh Museum would be greatly increased for the people, who were too far from London to avail themselves of the national museums there, if more exhibits could be temporarily transferred to Edinburgh from London. The Treasury, he was sure, would not grudge the money for the transport of these objects.

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS assured the hon. Gentleman that he entirely approved of the principle of the distribution of works of art, in order that as large a number of people as possible might have the opportunity to see them. With regard to the point that no money was yet found for the completion of South Kensington, the Treasury were really tied by the Report of the Royal Commission on Secondary Education and by the fact that a Committee was inquiring at the present moment into the whole administration of South Kensington. The Royal Commission, which reported a short time ago, recommended that part of the staff at South Kensington should be put under the roof of the Education Department at Whitehall. As the Committee knew, the Office of Works was now having plans prepared for new Government offices at Whitehall, and provision would be made for sufficiently large Education Offices to house any additional staff that might have to be placed there. Apart from that objection, it was idle to expect that the House would sanction a large expenditure on South Kensington when the whole subject of South Kensington was under the consideration of a Parliamentary Committee. He could assure the House that the Government were most anxious to get rid of the scandalous condition of the approach to South Kensington, especially at the part next to the Brompton Oratory.

MR. BURNS pressed his point with regard to the Imperial Institute. The building was perfectly useless as it was, and should be diverted to art and education. He was sure that if it were brought to the knowledge of Her Majesty and the Commissioners of the Institute that South Kensington wanted it, the transference would be made. The Institute very soon became a cross between a restaurant and Burlington Arcade, then it "petered-out," until now it had become a centre to which trade union secretaries and officers of friendly societies were invited for cheap dinners.

Vote agreed to.

9. £16,000, to complete the sum for Diplomatic and Consular Buildings.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest) asked whether there was any Report published showing the state of the cemeteries abroad?

*MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that a Report existed, but unless the hon. Member could mention a specific case he feared that he could not give him accurate details at the moment. He should be happy, however, to give the hon. Member the Report, while assuring him that the Government watched this subject with great care.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked as to the system of check which prevailed as to the expenditure of money in different parts of the world on embassies and other Government buildings. In Vienna, for example, he found that nothing was charged in the Estimates last year, but this year there was a sum of a thousand guineas for renewing the heating apparatus at the Embassy. There was apparently no check on these items at headquarters in this country.

Mr. HERBERT LEWIS said that when he was in China he heard of a case where a building was to be erected at a cost of 1,000 taels. The contract was sublet for 700 taels; the second sub-contractor re-let the contract for 500 taels, and ultimately the amount was reduced to 300 taels. The last sub-contractor began the work but was unable to go on with it for want of funds. Were precautions taken in distant parts of the world in these matters, and what was the nature of the reports received as to the various necessities of the Embassies?

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said they had resident surveyors in certain places abroad in charge of these buildings, and there was a surveyor who went from place to place on the continent, while there were other surveyors who were stationed abroad. Reports were placed before the Department, and he had an opportunity of seeing them at certain times of the year. Great care was taken to see that the expenditure was authorised and that the contracts were properly fulfilled. But the work of checking was not so easy as in this country, though he was certain that no more efficient control could be kept than at present.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) drew attention to the rooms for Attachés and Secretaries at the Paris Embassy, and said that some effort should be made to improve the accommodation.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £132,291, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the Survey of the United Kingdom, and for minor services connected therewith."

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) complained of the confused way in which the Estimate was drawn up. No country existed where the Ordnance maps were more required to be drawn up in an intelligent manner than in Ireland, owing to the fact that every tenant needed a map showing his holding in appearing before the Land Commission. The Ordnance maps were far worse now than they were 50 years ago. The maps made in the forties had all the levels and heights upon them, and they were most valuable details; but they had been omitted in the present maps. Why was this? He understood that the Treasury would not make a sufficient allowance to meet the expense of their production. Many engineers and surveyors used to complain of the fulness of the old maps, saying that the bread was taken out of their mouths, because with those maps anybody could do the work of surveying himself. In consequence of the establishment of the Registration of Titles Office in Ireland, accurate mapping had become very essential. The fine accuracy of the maps of the forties was not now reproduced, although it was so desirable that the details should be microscopically accurate. Why was the survey of Ireland in a more backward state than that of Great Britain; and why was there not a larger stock of the maps published? He urged the Government to exert pressure with a view to bringing the larger Irish survey to a conclusion within a reasonable time. The survey for England was to be completed in 1910, but the survey for Ireland was only to be completed in 1920, and yet there was more necessity for dispatch in the case of the Irish survey than in the case of the British. The information which had been expected from the Government as to the progress of these surveys had not been given. On the last occasion when this Vote was under consideration the President of the Board of Agriculture promised that he would endeavour to make these maps primâ facie evidence of their contents. He knew it was not a simple matter, but thought that these maps ought to be constituted good evidence, especially when they had existed unchallenged for 40 or 50 years. For example, a right of way marked in a map 50 years ago ought to be accepted to-day. Take the case of the Giant's Causeway, which had recently been the subject of litigation. The question of a right of way was raised, and the right of way was shown on the map. In such cases more importance ought to be attached to the evidence of the map than was sometimes attributed to it in Courts of Law. When Estimates of this kind were prepared for next year, he hoped that the sums spent in England and Ireland respectively would be distinguished. He observed that £3,000 appeared for work done in the Land Judges' Court in Ireland, although every penny of that sum was repaid to the Government by the suitors in the Court. This ought not to be debited to Ireland. The Estimates were mixed Estimates for the United Kingdom, but in view of future inquiries they ought not to be presented in that way. It ought to be possible to discriminate between the charges for England and Ireland. This was an omnibus Vote and it was, therefore, very difficult to say how much went to pay men in Ireland, and how much to pay men in England. If the Estimates were prepared differently, it might appear that too much was being spent in England and too little in Ireland, but at present it was not possible to form a definite opinion upon the subject. He wished to know what had been done to ameliorate the condition of the clerks about whom so much was heard a year or two ago?

*Sir BARRINGTON SIMEON (Southampton) said that the civil assistants on the Ordnance Survey were very hardly treated. They received very small pay and no pension. It had been represented that the work of the Ordnance Survey would be finished in 1880, and yet the Department was now as busy as ever. The fact was the work of the Ordnance Survey would never be completed, as it would always be necessary to keep the plans up to date, and these men ought, therefore, to be treated as a permanent staff. Those men who had joined since 1873 had not been allowed to benefit in the superannuation. The hon. Gentleman opposite said that the Ordnance Survey for England would be completed in 1910, and that for Ireland in 1920, but in reality it would never be completed.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said he had taken it from the Estimates.

*Sir BARRINGTON SIMEON said whoever made the statement must be mistaken. It had been argued that the wages of these men were so good that they did not require pensions. The facts were that after 15 years' service these men would get the great wage of 30s. a week, and after 24 years' service, if they never misconducted themselves and were fortunate, they would get 50s. a week. These men, however, were not labouring men, their education had cost them money, for which they not unnaturally wished to repay themselves. They had, moreover, to keep themselves fairly well dressed. They entered the service at 14, and earned only 50s. a week when 48 years of age. He knew about 600 of them, and they were, many of them, obliged to wear spectacles, their work tried their eyesight so greatly. When they left the service, they found it difficult to obtain fresh employment, especially work requiring good eyesight. He could produce several men who would swear that when they joined the service, they were solemnly told they would receive a pension at the age of 60, and but for this they would never have joined it. He trusted the Government would see their way to help the men for whom he spoke, who deserved pensions much more than many people who received them.

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said he desired to support the appeal that had just been made on behalf of the civil assistants in the Ordnance Survey. They were mostly engaged in drawing ordnance maps, and he was assured that the work required considerable skill and education. He could not understand why these civil servants were not granted pensions like the rest of the Civil Service of this country. The workers in the Ordnance Survey deserved pensions as much as anyone. Moreover, promotion to the higher posts in the service was denied to them. He thought the officials for whom he was speaking had the additional claim that in this particular Department the avenues to promotion were to a great extent blocked, as the higher positions were held by military men. He did not think it could be for a moment contended that the wages of these servants had been fixed specially on a high scale in view of their not receiving pensions. Even if the Secretary to the Treasury could state that every one of these civil assistants had been warned before he entered the service that he would not get a pension, that would not much alter his mind as to the justice of their claim, because it was a matter of common knowledge that the Treasury might, if they chose to sweat the employés of the country, get men to come into the Civil Service and do work for a much less salary and pension than now obtained. But that was not the principle upon which the public service of the country was run. The Government had always recognised that they ought to treat the Civil Service in a fair spirit, and if any hardship could be proved to exist—even if the men had joined knowing that hardship—it ought to be removed.

Captain BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness) suggested that reports should be published periodically showing the progress that had been made in the survey.

Mr. CALDWELL complained that the Estimate in the form it was presented did not give the information to which the Members of the Committee were entitled. For instance, with regard to Class A, they simply knew that these men were in receipt of military fees from the Army Fund, but they were not informed the amount. Not only were some of the men drawing the sums mentioned in this Vote, but at the same time they were drawing full pay from the Military Fund. Here it was stated that the Director got £1,200 a year on this Vote, but he should like to know, and they were entitled to know, how much he was drawing as a pension in addition. They did not want to have pluralists coming in and cutting other men out of employment, because they, being pluralists, could afford to do the work at a much less salary than should, perhaps properly, be attached to the office. There ought to appear on the face of the Estimate a statement of the real salaries these men were drawing. The military assistants were not all men who entered the Civil Service and rose gradually in position; they were persons who drew pensions in addition to the pay they received. These pensioners took less pay than men who relied on the employment, and so the rate of wages paid by the State was kept down, but the salaries did not represent all their emoluments. There should be a sheet giving the particulars of what each man received, both pension and salary, and he hoped that fuller information would be given next year.

Mr. LOUGH thought this one of the most important Votes that had come under consideration during the evening. We spent nearly a quarter of a million of money on our Ordnance Survey, and got less value under that head than any country in the world. Our maps compared badly with those of other countries. A short time since he saw some maps of Norway, beautifully coloured in half-a-dozen tints, the whole configuration of the country—rivers, mountains, waterfalls—all clearly shown and beautifully executed. There was much to be done to bring our Ordnance maps up to the level of other countries. The sale of Ordnance maps had never been large, but he noticed there had been a falling off in the sales to the amount of £2,000 or £3,000. Could the right hon. Gentleman explain this? Had he made any progress with the proposal for keeping the maps on sale at post offices? As to the remarks of the hon. Member who had just spoken, he believed this Ordnance Survey Service was little short of a scandal. The right sort of men were not employed, and proper discipline was not maintained among them. The hon. Gentleman opposite complained of the rate of pay, but he did not mention that they were nearly all pluralists—that there were a number of Army and Navy pensioners among them. Each one of these classes was full of pluralists, and the men who were engaged were not selected for the work, and, he considered, were not fit for the work. He believed in public servants being well chosen and well paid, but they could not choose them well if they made a great Service like this a refuge, principally for military men who had not been successful at their other work. Each officer not only received the amount mentioned in the Estimates, but his full Army pay; and, in addition, he saw by the Vote that they were allowed to give lectures at the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, for which they got further emoluments from that Department. How could they have a great Service like this properly conducted under such a system? They should select Gentlemen who were well suited for the positions, and should get the best servants they possibly could in each Department, and then he would go with the hon. Baronet opposite and say that they should pay them well. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would be willing to appoint a Committee to inquire into the important questions raised by the hon. Baronet opposite on the present state of this very important Service.

Major JAMESON (Clare, W.) said he rose to protest against the attack made by the hon. Member who had just sat down, and by the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, on the soldiers who were employed in this Service. The hon. Member for Islington had told them that one of the first essentials was discipline. Where would he go for discipline if not to the Army? ["Hear, hear!"] Would he have them go to himself? [Laughter.] He thought these men were grossly underpaid, and the hon. Member argued that they should bring up the salaries. But how was he going to begin? He reminded him of the individual who, in order to lengthen his blanket, cut a piece off the top and sewed it on to the bottom. [Laughter.] That was just what the hon. Gentleman wished to do. Every single officer who had been appointed to this Survey was a man who was thoroughly trusted by his superiors, and who had done good and long service for his country. He did not believe that in any country in Europe they would get men who had more faithfully served their country, or who were greater authorities on the subject on which they were employed. When he was on active service he had had frequent occasion to consult the Ordnance maps, and had always found them sufficient for his purpose.

Mr. BURNS said the hon. and gallant Gentleman had entirely ignored the criticism directed against the preparation of this Estimate. He found that 24 officers received £7,938, and he was informed that that was pay and allowances given to them plus their military active pay, and, in some cases, plus their pension. The only thing that Members on that side of the Commitee wished was that they should know the total amount of pay they received for Survey work. It was well the Committee should be told what the officers received as active service pay or as pensions in one or other branch of the Imperial Service. If they were they would be able to separate the Survey Vote from the Pluralist Vote, and much of the criticism directed against the Army officers, who had such a large share of these appointments, would be disposed of. His suggestion was that the Estimate should be so framed that the Committee would know what was paid for survey, pensions, and for active military service. It seemed to him that Army Reserve and long-service men, whose pensions were small, might reasonably be employed as labourers and office cleaners; but how could hon. Gentlemen opposite defend two Lieutenant-Colonels getting £1,095, for what, after all, was civil engineer work? The fact that a man belonged to the Army did not prove that his qualifications for survey work were superior to those of civilians. How could the President of the Board of Agriculture, who evinced such great interest in this subject, defend a system under which 1,650 civil assistants got no pensions, while officers got £1,095 for Civil Service survey work, and £400 or £500 a year as pensions? He believed in good salaries, and he was not against Army men being employed under fair and just conditions; but there was a feeling growing that Army Reserve men, and Royal Engineers in particular, were being unduly employed. There were military men in that House who were under the impression that in the Survey Department and in the Science and Art Department, and many other departments, the Royal Engineers should get hold of all the good civilian employment. He protested against it. He thought they ought to have many men like Mr. Stanford and other experts in the Civil Service, and he cordially supported the hon. Baronet in his contention, for he objected to pluralists.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. WALTER LONG, Liverpool, West Derby) said he did not think it was necessary for him to reply to the whole of the speeches. The speech of the hon. Member for Islington had been abundantly replied to from the hon. Member's own side of the House. He was very glad that the interest attacked had found an eloquent and competent defender on the other side. ["Hear, hear!"] When they wanted skilled men for Ordnance Survey work they naturally went to the Royal Engineers, and not to other branches of the Army. The hon. Member for Louth complained earlier in the evening as to the condition of the survey in Ireland. He admitted that the Ordnance Survey, with regard to the production of maps in Ireland, was not so satisfactory as they could wish to see. But he was bound to say that their expenditure in Ireland was fully sufficient, amounting as it did to 24 per cent. of the total expenditure. He was sorry, in regard to the production of the one-inch map, that it was not so modernised as in England, but that was largely owing to the fact that they were anxious to complete the one-inch survey in England. The skilled men who were now employed in England would then be ready for the production of the work in Ireland. Many of the one-inch maps in Ireland were not brought up to modern requirements. They were now endeavouring to complete the one-inch map in England, and so soon as that was done, they could employ the men in bringing the maps in Ireland up to the most modern form. With regard to the general survey map for England, which had been condemned, he had been at considerable trouble to ascertain how it compared with the maps of foreign countries, and all the evidence he could obtain was entirely opposed to the statement that our map was inferior to those of other countries. But any suggestions for the improvement of the map would be considered by the Department, who in the discharge of their duties spared no trouble to secure a satisfactory result. As to the distribution of the maps, a Committee was appointed and made some very valuable recommendations. He had been able to carry out their suggestions, and had arranged that no fewer than 800 post offices should be made depôts for the sale of the maps; and he hoped he would be able to increase the number. These offices were in all parts of the United Kingdom. At each office maps could be ordered, and an index of all the different maps could be consulted. With regard to the military officers, he pointed out that the aggregate amount they received was stated in the footnote to the Vote. The amount they received from the Army Votes was £26,900. He did not think it was reasonable to ask that, in addition to the money paid them for services to the Ordnance Survey, the Vote should state the exact sum that each received as soldiers or as men who had served their country in other branches.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said the Treasury ought to give some information on this point. A strong case had been made out in favour of the civil assistants, whose claims had been treated with silent contempt.

MR. HANBURY: No, no. The hon. Member knows there is no time to reply.

MR. DILLON said there was plenty of time. These men, who did the bulk of the work, were entitled to more consideration. He had made a calculation, and found that they received an average of £95 a year each.

The HON. MEMBER was speaking at midnight, when the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday, 26th April; Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday 6th May.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY (FOREIGN SHIPOWNERS) AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading defered till Thursday 6th May.

TOWN HOLDINGS (TENANTS' COMPENSATION) BILL.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said the First Lord of the Treasury had, early in the sitting, promised to take the Irish Estimates in the month of May. There were one or two Irish questions arising out of other Votes—for instance, the question of the Government refusing to pay rates on Government buildings in some small Irish towns—and he wished to know whether those Votes would be postponed until the Irish Votes were taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he was afraid he could not give any pledge; but of course he was always glad to receive suggestions, and, if possible, to act on them.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS asked whether Supply would be proceeded with on the Friday after the holidays?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY replied that on the Monday after the Easter holidays the Necessitous School Boards Bill would be proceeded with. The Thursday following would be devoted either to the Budget or to the introduction of the Employers' Liability Bill, and Supply would be taken on the Friday. Report of Supply would come on naturally on the Monday, when the House reassembled.

VERMINOUS PERSONS BILL.

On the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. WALTER HAZELL (Leicester), who was received with ironical cheers, made an appeal to hon. Members to allow this Bill to pass. There were 60,000 persons living in London lodging-houses who were in danger of becoming infested with vermin—

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think any hon. Member is raising any objection to the Bill.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): We will not object as long as the other side will give us our Licensing Bill. [Laughter and cheers.]

Bill Read a Second time, amid ironical cheers, and committed for Monday next.

SALE OF DISTRESS AMENDMENT BILL.

POOR LAW OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION (IRELAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday 29th April.

PARISH REGISTERS BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 28th April.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Motion for committal to Select Committee [24th March] further adjourned till Monday next.

LICENSING EXEMPTION (HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT) BILL.

On the Order for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. T. P. WHITTAKER (Yorks, W.R., Spen Valley) objected.

LORD STANLEY said: May I make an appeal to the hon. Member? It is, perhaps, of more value to the Members of this House than the Bill which we have just Read a Second time. [Laughter and cheers.]

MR. WHITTAKER said that there must be reasonable time for discussion. Three times when this Bill was down the House had been counted out with the consent of the Government. [Cries of "Discuss now!"]

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: We cannot Divide after Twelve o'clock. I object.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

House Adjourned at Ten Minutes after Twelve o'Clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday 12th April 1897.

UNIVERSITIES OF OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE ACT 1877 (ORIEL COLLEGE, OXFORD) (STATUTE).

The Comptroller of the Household reported Her Majesty's answer to the humble Address of the 26th March, as followeth:—

"I have received your Address praying that I will withhold My consent from the Statute made by the Governing Body of Oriel College, Oxford, altering Statute IV. of the Statutes of the College by the insertion after the 18th Clause of a new Clause numbered 18*a*. I will comply with your advice."

LIQUOR TRAFFIC LOCAL VETO (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Wednesday till Wednesday 19th May.

TITHE REDEMPTION BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday 3rd May.

QUESTIONS.

CHARGE OF BURGLARY (DOWNPATRICK).

Colonel WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland (1) whether his attention has been drawn to the case of a man who was arrested near the town of Downpatrick, on the morning of Sunday the 21st March, by the constabulary under suspicious circumstances, and charged with having burglariously entered the licensed premises and residence of James M'Cardell, in Downpatrick, and abstracted therefrom a bottle labelled whiskey, and that the prisoner, after being duly cautioned, admitted the burglary; (2) whether he is aware that upon being brought before a local magistrate the prisoner was remanded till the next morning to a special Court, and that upon the prisoner being brought before the remanding magistrate at a special Court, four other Justices (two of them from a country district) attended, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the remanding local Justice and the clerk of the Petty Sessions, upon the representation of a solicitor appearing for the prisoner that he was not responsible for his acts, forthwith, upon evidence being given by a local medical practitioner, committed him as a lunatic to the asylum; and (3) whether the said Justices were warranted in so acting, instead of duly returning the prisoner for trial; and, if not, whether the attention of the Irish Lord Chancellor has been or will be drawn to the occurrence with a view to prevent a recurrence of such a practice?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): The facts are substantially as stated in the first and second paragraphs of the Question, save that the Special Court was composed of five Justices, all of whom reside in the Petty Sessions district in which the offence was committed, and usually sit at the Petty Sessions for that district, and also that the only remonstrance addressed to the magistrates, who decided unanimously, was addressed to them by the Petty Sessions Clerk alone. The magistrates should have returned the prisoner for trial; but, as there seems to be little doubt that the prisoner was not of sound mind when he committed the offence, and as, if he recovers, he will be liable to be re-arrested and committed for trial on the charge, justice will not be defeated, and the proceedings, though irregular, only amount to an error of judgment on the part of the magistrates and do not call for the intervention of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. J. GILHOOLY (Cork Co., W.) asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that the individual in question had been subsequently pronounced to be perfectly sane, with the result that those who had placed him in the asylum had had to bear the cost of his removal?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND: The information in my possession is directly to the contrary.

UNCLAIMED FUNDS.

MR. J. E. GORDON (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will consider the advantage, to the public and the Treasury, of such legislation as will grant to the State custody of funds now in the care of bankers and others, but which have remained unclaimed during a period of years?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This question has been frequently considered by the Treasury, but the difficulties connected with it are very great, and I am afraid that I cannot undertake to deal with it in the manner suggested by the hon. Member.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE SHORTHAND WRITERS.

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when, by whom, and for what period the shorthand writers of the House are appointed; whether there is any public competition by tender or otherwise for the post; and whether he is aware that the amount of their charges is about double that usually obtained by shorthand writers?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The shorthand writer is appointed by the Clerk of the House under a Resolution of the House passed on 8th May 1813. The last appointment was in 1872. A fresh appointment is only made on a vacancy arising. I am not aware of any public competition. The scale of charges is fixed by Standing Orders (Table of Fees) at £2 2s. per diem for note-taking, and 9d. per folio of 72 words transcribed. The rate per folio paid by the Treasury to shorthand writers for temporary commissions is 6d., and in the Law Courts the charge is 8d. It is alleged that the fees of barristers, solicitors, and others engaged in Parliamentary work are also on a higher scale. The Treasury, however, has no power in the matter.

SALE OF ESTATE (BANTRY, CO. CORK).

MR. JAMES GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state approximately when the sale of the estate of Mr. R. H. E. Whyte, which is situate near Bantry, County Cork, will take place?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am informed that it is not yet possible to state, even approximately, the date at which the sale of this estate will take place. The event will depend, in a very large measure, on the activity shown by the parties having charge of the proceedings.

EDUCATION RESULTS FEES (IRELAND).

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, inasmuch as the greater part of the results fees paid by the Intermediate Education Board in Ireland are derived from the Customs and Excise grant, and as the grants made by County Councils in England in aid of technical education are derived from the same source, he can explain on what ground the one is considered by the Science and Art Department to be an endowment, and the other is not; and whether he will direct the Department to give equal treatment in this matter to the English and Irish schools?

*MR. HANBURY (on behalf of Sir J. GORST): The Department have been acting on the decision given by the Public Accounts Committee in 1890, that results fees paid by the Intermediate Education Board out of their original endowment fund should be treated as endowment. I do not know if the Board can say how much, if any, of the fees paid by them is derived from the Customs and Excise grant, and not from the endowment fund, but I will communicate with them on the subject.

BELFAST CORPORATION AND LONDONDERRY IMPROVEMENT BILLS.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that, though the evidence given before the Committee of 1896 on the Belfast Corporation and Londonderry Improvement Bills was ordered to be printed, and was printed, in a Blue-book from the shorthand notes, and though part of the time was occupied by witnesses who were called by the Committee and not by the parties, the whole cost of the shorthand writer's notes has been charged to the parties, including a charge to some petitioners in respect of days when they were not represented; will he explain on what grounds the Treasury has refused to pay any part of the cost; and whether, having regard to the fact that some of the petitioners appeared to urge matters of public interest, and that the Bill was sent to a hybrid Committee owing to its semi-public character, the Treasury will now pay the shorthand writer's fees?

*Mr. HANBURY: The facts are, I believe, as stated. I cannot find that the Treasury has ever been asked to pay part of the cost of the shorthand writer's notes, but if such a request were made, I do not see how such a charge on the general taxpayer could be justified. The Acts were not Government Measures, and it is distinctly provided in each Act that the costs, charges, and expenses of and incident to the preparing, applying for, obtaining, and passing the Measures should be paid by the Corporation. I have already explained that the shorthand writer's fees are high, and that the Treasury have no control over them.

LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in how many cases of fair rent appeals for the second statutory term Mr. Commissioner O'Brien has been a member of the Court adjudicating on the appeals, and in how many cases the Court was exclusively composed of Commissioners appointed by Conservative Governments?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: On Friday last I stated that the composition of the Court when hearing appeals is arranged by the Commissioners amongst themselves, having regard to their other official engagements, and I also mentioned the number of occasions on which each Commissioner sat since October last.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to the fact that there are over 24,000 applications to have a fair rent fixed by the Land Commission and the Civil Bill Courts now pending, and that only 261 fair rents were fixed during February, being an average of less than three rents for each judicial personage employed; (2) whether he is able to explain the cause of this delay; (3) whether, if it is due to the difficulty which the Sub-Commissioners feel in filling up the pink paper, he will ask the Land Commission to consider the advisability of simplifying that document; and (4) whether he can state what was the total number of fair rents fixed for the second statutory term by Sub-Commissioners up to the end of March, and in how many of these cases appeals have been lodged?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: It is not correct to say that only 261 fair rents were fixed during February. The Sub-Commissioners alone disposed of 685 applications in that month to fix fair rents for a first and second statutory term, in addition to a number of cases disposed of by the Civil Bill Courts. I am unable to answer the third paragraph, but think it probable that, as the Sub-Commission get more accustomed to the work, they will be able to dispose of cases more rapidly. In March, 1,284 applications in all were disposed of, and 2,515 fair rents for second terms have been fixed up to the end of March; 1,191 notices of appeal have been received, including notices in cross cases.

Mr. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether one of the two Assistant Lay Land Commissioners attached to the Strabane Sub-Commission has been withdrawn for the purpose of valuing farms for the Court of Appeal of the Land Commission, with the result that cases are now being heard, farms inspected, and rents fixed by one Assistant Lay Commissioner only; and, if so, whether such practice has the sanction of the Irish Government?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: It is the fact that one of the Lay Assistant Commissioners attached to the Strabane Sub-Commission has been withdrawn for the purpose stated, and that cases are now being heard and rents fixed by the Chairman and one Lay Assistant Commissioner, not by the latter alone, as alleged in the Question. The powers of delegation referred to are conferred by statute upon the Land Commission, and do not require the sanction of Government.

Mr. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by whose authority or permission Mr. Hume Babington, Permanent Assistant Land Commissioner, absented himself from his duty on Wednesday, the 31st of March last, to attend a meeting of the Derry and Raphoe Diocesan Council, held in Londonderry; was Mr. Babington, as a public official, within his right in assisting to pass a resolution at the said meeting, declaring that Parliament would be guilty of deliberate confiscation if it passed any legislation interfering with the endowments of the Erasmus Smith Schools; and whether, considering the present congested state of business in the Courts, Land Commissioners will be forbidden to attend public meetings, whether of a political or a religous character?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not yet in possession of the facts relative to the alleged attendance of this gentleman at the meeting referred to, and cannot, therefore, reply to the Question to-day.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the reason of the delay of the Land Commission in issuing a list for the hearing of cases fixing fair rents in the Union of Tipperary, seeing that there are over 100 cases already lodged?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: There are 44, not 100, cases pending in this Union, and a list for the hearing of these cases will be issued in the course of the next ten days.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he will make inquiry into the case of a tenant farmer named Thomas Tracey, of Newcastle, near Athenry, county Galway, whose application (Record No. 15,580) to fix fair rent on the estate of Captain Hall was heard on 4th January last; whether any, and, if so, what, objection was taken at the hearing to the area of the farm as mentioned in the originating notice; whether he is aware that, notwithstanding, the land agent, on inspection of the holding by the Sub-Commissioners, then raised an objection as to the area for which the tenant had been paying rent, and thereupon the Sub-Commissioners adjourned the case for evidence as to area; and whether it is the practice to put the tenant to the inconvenience and expense of again attending in Court, where the landlord objecting to the area, failed at the hearing to give evidence as to his alleged area?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: No objection was made at the hearing, but it appears that, on the inspection of the farm by the Assistant Commissioners, the representative of the landlord and the tenants disagreed as to the boundaries of the holding, and the case, following the usual procedure, was adjourned in order to enable the parties to come to a mutual agreement. If the parties agree without further delay, no further hearing will be necessary.

DISTRESS (ACHILL ISLAND, CO. MAYO).

Dr. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the great distress at present prevailing in Achill Island, county Mayo; is he aware that there were on outdoor relief, in the month of February 1897, 384 persons as compared with 72 in the corresponding month in 1896; and whether, in view of these facts, he will see that remunerative relief works are at once established in the island?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Representations have been received relative to the existence of distress in Achill Island. The numbers on outdoor relief in the island in February last were 417 as compared with 46 in February 1896. The construction of a pier has been undertaken by the Congested Districts Board at Keel, and this work will no doubt afford employment to a number of persons in that district. I hope also that work will shortly be commenced at Achill Sound in connection with the proposed steamer service between the present railway terminus and Belmullet. It is not the intention of the Government to establish relief works.

KASSALA.

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Government has been called to declarations by the Italian Ministers to the effect that Kassala is about to be restored to Egypt; what calculation has been made of the cost to the Egyptian Budget of holding that post, estimated by the Italian Minister of Marine as £60,000 a year; and what military measures are in contemplation for the protection of Kassala when handed over?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): We have not heard of any declarations by Italian Ministers of the character referred to, nor have Her Majesty's Government received any intimation of such an intention from the Italian Government. If any such intimation were made it would be for the Egyptian Government to examine the military and financial questions involved, and to consider whether the offer could be accepted.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY ACT (EAST LANCASHIRE PAPER MILL COMPANY).

COLONEL MELLOR (Lancashire, Radcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the inquiry into the case of the workpeople of the East Lancashire Paper Mill Company in Radcliffe, alleged to have been dismissed for giving evidence in a recent case arising out of the Employers' Liability Act, has been completed; if the representatives of the Company were afforded the same opportunity for stating their case when the Treasury Solicitor visited Radcliffe as was afforded to the discharged workpeople; if he will state the result of the inquiry; and whether he would consider the expediency of introducing into an amended Employers' Liability Act the provisions of the Protection of Witnesses Act, for the protection of workpeople who may be called upon to give evidence in cases arising out of the Employers' Liability Act?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The inquiry which the Treasury Solicitor instituted at my request was completed some days ago. As its object was to ascertain if there were any grounds for a prosecution, he naturally did not take statements from persons who might have been involved in a criminal charge. The result, however, showing that no prosecution could be undertaken, I have given the company an opportunity of explaining their action, and they have submitted statements to show that two of the men were dismissed for bad work, the third for disobedience. I cannot say that I am able to regard the explanation as quite satisfactory; the more so that no explanation is attempted of their dismissal of the sister of the plaintiff in the suit, a point to which I called their special attention. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not think that the matter comes within the scope of the Employers' Liability Bill.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the postal authorities have communicated with the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland respecting the carriage by rail of the mails to and from Bundoran and Ballyshannon, in the county of Donegal, and adjacent districts, now carried by car to the great inconvenience of the residents of those districts; and, if so, with what result; and whether these districts will receive from the 1st proximo the benefits of the accelerated mail system?

*MR. HANBURY: The Post Office has communicated with the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland respecting the conveyance of the night mails to and from Bundoran and Ballyshannon by railway instead of by car, but it is found that the expense involved in the establishment of suitable trains would be altogether disproportionate to the revenue available. With regard to the accleration to take effect on the 1st proximo—that is of the day mail services in Ireland—the Department has not yet received any definite reply from the railway company as to whether they can extend the benefits of the acceleration to the district between Dundalk and Enniskillen, but there is, it is feared, little probability of including Ballyshannon and Bundoran and other places beyond Enniskillen in the arrangement.

MR. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can state to the House the reasons which caused the Postmaster General to refuse to grant the request of the deputation from the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom, which waited upon him on Tuesday the 6th instant, viz., that the whole of the two hours gained by the recent acceleration of the Irish mails might be devoted every day to increase the time in Ireland between the arrival and dispatch of the mails, so that merchants and others might have good time to answer their letters by return of post?

*MR. HANBURY: The reason was the practical impossibility of the proposal. The down night mails cannot all be ready before 8.30 at the earliest. At 8.30 the Scotch mail starts, and as an interval of at least 15 minutes is necessary for safety, the Irish mail cannot start before 8.45. The up night mail leaves Dublin 50 minutes later than hitherto. This extension of time has been obtained by connecting the up night mail at Crewe with a later train than hitherto for the north of Scotland, which means some sacrifice of postal convenience. The severance of the connection with the north which would follow any later dispatch from Dublin would be wholly without justification. Besides that, the arrival of the Irish mail in London would be later than formerly, and a smaller proportion of the letters would fall into the first delivery. The time of departure from London of the night down train and the time of arrival at Crewe and London of the night up train are thus fixed conditions of the problem, and (with the contract margin of two hours and five minutes at Holyhead between the arrival of the up mail and the departure of the down mail) make a larger extension of time in Ireland impracticable.

INDIAN FAMINE.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the demand made by the Bengal Branch of the Famine Relief Fund on the Central Relief Fund for about one-third of the entire Fund; whether he has information that out of 51½ lacs already distributed 11 lacs have been assigned to Bengal, while the North-West Provinces and Oudh have received 17 lacs; whether on the basis of proportionate distress as revealed by the number of persons on relief works, the North-West Provinces and Oudh would be entitled to 51·45 per cent of the total receipts, and Bengal to only 12·75; and whether he is in a position to exercise any influence over the administrators of the Central Fund to secure that it shall be fairly and proportionately distributed?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I am not aware of the proportions in which the Famine Relief Fund has been allotted by the Central Committee between the various affected districts, but I know that the distribution is made after a careful consideration of their competing claims. I have also reason to believe that the Central Committee is in constant communication with the Government of India, and gladly accepts its advice and assistance. But I have no influence in the matter, nor does it appear to me to be possible or desirable for any person in this country to attempt to control the local administration of the Fund.

MR. JAMES BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he can explain why it is that the allowance sanctioned from 1st November 1896 as grain compensation to all native employés (Government servants) in the famine-stricken districts, drawing 10 rupees per month and under, was not given to the recipients till the middle of March 1897; and whether any Government department is especially responsible for this delay in distribution?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Grain compensation is sanctioned by the local authorities, and the dates of such sanctions are not necessarily reported to the central Government: but I have sufficient information to enable me to say that in many cases the compensation was granted before November 1 1896. As to the delay alleged to have taken place, by which the grant was postponed beyond the middle of March 1897, I have no knowledge at present; but if the name of the district in question is supplied to me I will make inquiry.

MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists with the administration of the famine relief and the management of famine relief works in the district of Cuddapore, in the Presidency of Madras; and whether he will cause to be published, or lay upon the Table of the House, the Reports recently addressed to the Government of Madras on the state of the district by the Famine Commissioner and the Sanitary Commissioner?

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not aware that dissatisfaction exists with regard to the administration of relief in the Cuddapore district. The latest monthly relief Report from Madras shows that at the end of January an area containing 284,000 inhabitants, and amounting to about one-fifth of the district, was considered to be affected. On March 6, 2,735 persons in this area were employed on relief works and 7,488 were receiving gratuitous relief. The unusually large proportion of people receiving gratuitous relief, which is attributed to the large "numbers of weavers relieved at their trade," warrants a belief that the administration of relief in Cuddapore is not illiberal. All reports relating to the famine in Madras have been and will be included in the Famine Papers presented periodically to Parliament while the famine continues. I should add that the Governor is giving very close supervision to the administration of famine relief within his presidency.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

Mr. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether the attention of the Irish Government has been drawn to the statement contained in a recent charge at Buncrana of the Coroner for the County of Donegal (within recent years a Member of this House) to the prevalent indications of efforts now being made in County Donegal to re-establish secret unlawful societies; and (2) whether, in view of such indications, the Government will reconsider the question of reducing the strength of the Royal Irish Constabulary in that county?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The attention of the Irish Government has been directed to recent observations made by the Coroner of Donegal in the sense indicated in the first paragraph. I do not think the Coroner was a Member of this House, though his predecessor was. In reducing the strength of the County Force, the responsible authorities have been guided both by experience and by local knowledge, and the Government see no reason, at present, for reconsidering the question.

POSTMASTERSHIP (MONAGHAN).

Mr. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, with reference to the recent vacancy in the postmastership of Monaghan, how many applications were received in reply to his invitation from applicants for this vacancy, of these how many were members of the First Class in the postal and telegraph branches of the Service, and of the aggregate number of applicants how many had a service of from 15 to 20 years, what number had a service of 20 and under 25 years, and how many with a service of over 25 years; and whether the gentleman upon whom the vacancy has been conferred entered the Service and obtained the certificate of his appointment in May 1885, and that until the date of his present appointment was a member of the Second Class of Sorting Clerks; if so, what particular qualifications did he possess that entitled him to this preferment over others his seniors and with a more diversified knowledge and experience of both postal and telegraph duties?

*__Mr. HANBURY__: The number of applications received for the Postmastership of Monaghan was 83. Of these, 22 were from members of the First Class; 17 candidates had service of from 15 to 20 years; 10 candidates had service of from 20 to 25 years; and five had over 25 years' service. The officer on whom the appointment was conferred entered the Service with a certificate in May 1885, and until the date of his present appointment was a Second Class Telegraphist or Sorting Clerk. Many of the candidates were from offices not in Ireland. The Postmaster General decided, however, in this case to appoint from the Irish list, and to select the officer on that list whose claims and qualifications best entitled him, in his opinion, to the promotion. The particular qualifications possessed by the selected candidate included a good knowledge of both postal and telegraph work, and experience in the duties of a head postmaster, gained during his service as a provincial clerk in charge, in which capacity he had undertaken the full management of post offices during the absence of postmasters.

WALLACE ESTATE (CO. ANTRIM).

MR. M. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to a circular sent by Mr. Fred. L. Capron, agent on the County Antrim Estate of the Lady Wallace, issued last month to the tenants, informing the tenants that, as they had not accepted the offer for sale made to them by Lady Wallace, that the rent due on 1st November last must be paid before 1st May next, otherwise the matter would be placed in the hands of his solicitor; (2) whether he is aware that it was the custom on this estate to allow a hanging gale or rent for one year to lie over; that, after the passing of the Land Law (Ireland) Act 1881, a large number of these tenants agreed to have judicial rents fixed at the amounts to be fixed by a Mr. Wilson, the landlord's valuer; and that, notwithstanding that it took some years to have the valuations made, and the tenants signed the judicial agreements in a body in 1884, the reductions dated back to 1882 and Judicial Rent was marked on rent receipts from the latter date; (3) whether these tenants are now entitled to have fair rents fixed in respect of a second statutory term; and (4) if something can be done to dissuade the agent from enforcing at this time of the year payment of the hanging gale?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed that a circular to the effect stated in the first paragraph has been issued to the tenants on this estate. A considerable number of agreements and declarations under Section 8, Sub-section (6), of the Land Act of 1881, fixing fair rents on the estate, were lodged with the Land Commission in the year 1884, but the Commissioners cannot express any opinion as to whether the tenants in these cases are now entitled to apply to have fair rents fixed for a second statutory term. They may have to determine the matter judicially. The Executive Government exercises no control over the management of the estate, and cannot take any action as suggested in the fourth paragraph.

TELEGRAMS (BELFAST).

MR. G. W. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that delay is caused to traders in the delivery of telegrams in Mount Pottinger, Belfast, owing to the fact that the Post Office there is not one of delivery; and if he can see his way, in view of the largely increased population, to have it made an office of delivery?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware that delay is caused to traders in the delivery of telegrams in Mount Pottinger, Belfast, owing to the fact that the Post Office there is not one for delivery. He will, however, make inquiry on the subject and will communicate with the hon. Member.

SCIENCE AND ART EXAMINATIONS.

MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he will consent to defer the Science and Art examinations in chemistry and other subjects, at present fixed for the 21st and 22nd of June, to a more convenient date?

MR. HANBURY (on behalf of Sir J. GORST): It has been arranged to postpone the Science and Art examinations, fixed for the 19th, 21st, and 22nd, to the 28th, 29th, and 30th of June. A circular is being sent to the schools to this effect.

METROPOLITAN ASYLUMS BOARD.

MR. ERNEST FLOWER (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board (1) whether he will direct the Metropolitan Asylums Board to make use of existing institutions; and, therefore, will the Local Government Board direct the Guardians to board out all eligible children; (2) whether those children who have contracted the diseases enumerated in the Order require institutional life; if so, is it the intention of the Local Government Board to instruct the Metropolitan Asylums Board to erect new institutions or to provide them with certain of the existing schools; and, if so, which of them; and (3) would he inform the House whether he intends to carry out those recommendations of the Departmental Committee which deal with the improvement of the education, the industrial training, the system of apprenticeship, and the greater control of the "ins and outs;" the development of small certified homes, the emigration of suitable children, and the alleviation of the condition of the 3,000 children now in the London workhouses (see page 67, paragraph 274); if so, to which of the various London bodies does he intend to intrust these duties?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): With regard to the first two paragraphs, it will be the duty of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum district, in the first instance, to consider what provisions are necessary under the recent Order of the Local Government Board, and to submit them for the consideration of the Board. As the Order constituting the managers as the new authority has only been in force a few days, it is obvious that they cannot have come to any decision on the arrangements which they will propose, and that I cannot make any statement as to what the arrangements will be. I am not quite clear as to what is meant by "institutional life," and, with regard to boarding out, while the Board have been always desirous of encouraging the system, I am not aware that we have any power to compel the Guardians to adopt it against their will; nor should I be willing to pledge myself to exercise that power as the hon. Member desires, even if we had. With regard to the long series of questions contained in the third paragraph, I have stated the general views of the Board in the House already, and it would be quite impossible for me to make a detailed statement upon them in reply to a question. But I may say that all the powers and duties of Guardians with reference to children which are not transferred to the Metropolitan Asylums Board will still devolve on the Guardians in accordance with the existing law. I should add that the hon. Member is in error in supposing that there are 3,000 children in the workhouses. I am advised that there are less than 1,000, and many of these on one ground or another are unfitted for ordinary school life. But it is always my desire to separate children as far as possible from any connection with workhouse life.

GRANGEGORMAN PRISON.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether, when he stated that Grangegorman Prison is primarily a convict prison, he had considered the fact that the number of convicts confined there are only 33, while the daily average of local prisoners is over 160; (2) can he state how many officers in Grangegorman hold appointments to the convict service, by whom and when the appointments were made, the rank of the officers, and length of service (if any) in a local prison prior to their promotion to the convict prison; (3) is he aware that there is a statutory distinction between the convict and the local prisons in Ireland; and (4) do convict prisons, established and governed by the Penal Servitude Acts, constitute organisations separate and distinct in law from local prisons; and, if so, are there two distinct prisons by statute in Grangegorman—namely, a convict and a local prison?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The numbers mentioned in the first paragraph are substantially accurate. The answer to the third and fourth paragraphs is in the affirmative. It will take some time to collect the information asked for in the second paragraph, and I am not in a position to give it to-day.

BANKRUPTCY ASSETS (IRELAND).

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it is the present practice of the Dublin Court of Bankruptcy that the assets realised should be lodged in the Bank of Ireland in the joint names of the official assignees and the creditors' assignees, in accordance with Section 61 of the Irish Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, 1857, and General Orders 242 and 243, made pursuant to the Bankruptcy Amendment Act, 1872; whether he is aware that in the case of Thomas F. Peel, a bankrupt, the acting official assignee, after the assets had been distributed, brought an appeal to the House of Lords against a decision of the Irish Court of Appeal, unanimously reversing a decision in said matter, that the creditor's assignee had refused to be a party to such proceedings, though by General Order 247 the creditor's assignee is bound to exercise a general superintendence over the proceedings, and that the appeal was dismissed by the House of Lords, without hearing the respondent's counsel, with costs, Lord Herschell expressing his surprise that such an appeal should have been brought; and could he state what was the amount of the costs, and out of what fund, and by whose authority, they were paid?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: The money received by the official assignee is regularly lodged in the Bank of Ireland in the manner required by the statute and General Orders to the credit of the estate and the assignees thereof. The hon. Member has, however, overlooked the fact that the General Orders of 1888 revoked the General Order 243 of the Orders of 1872 which he refers to. The appeal, which had been advised by two eminent English counsel, was brought after the assets had been disturbed. The creditor's assignee, on hearing that an appeal was contemplated, resigned his office, stating that he had never desired to hold it and was accordingly, by order made at his own request, removed, and the appeal to the House of Lords was not lodged till after his removal. According to the verbatim report of the proceedings, Lord Herschell does not appear to have made any statement to the effect that the appeal ought not to have been brought, and I am informed that the decision of the House of Lords in this case was largely influenced by their decision in a case of Hebly v. Mathews, pronounced only a few days previously, overruling a decision of the Court of Appeal in England, on which the advice given by counsel was in some degree based. The costs named amounted to the sum of £1,006 9s. 6d., and were paid out of the unclaimed dividends account, in accordance with the provisions of the 35 and 36 Vict. c. 58, sec. 77, and the 40 and 41 Vict. c. 57, sec. 85.

SULGRAVE NATIONAL SCHOOL (NORTHAMPTONSHIRE).

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education (1) whether he is aware that the National School at Sulgrave, Northamptonshire, has for years past been the subject of repeated disputes and conflicts between rival bodies of managers whose authority individually and collectively has been continually challenged, with the result that the school has been closed (owing to inability to pay the teachers on account of failure of subscriptions) for nine months in 1893, and for six months in 1896; that a poll of the parish, taken on 28th December, 1896, resulted in a majority for forming a School Board; and that the Parish Council has at a subsequent meeting further applied to the Education Department to form a School Board; and (2) whether the Education Department will now issue an order for the formation of a School Board, as the most prompt and permanent settlement of the educational difficulties of the parish?

*MR. HANBURY (on behalf of Sir J. GORST): The facts are as stated in paragraph (1), except that the Committee of Council have received no information as to the poll said to have been taken on 28th December, 1896. A final notice issued by the Education Department has expired, but the Department is informed that the school has now been reopened under a certificated teacher; there therefore appears to be no reason for setting up a School Board in pursuance of the final notice.

MR. CHANNING: In consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's reply, I shall put a further Question after the recess.

PASSENGERS FROM AUSTRALIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience suffered by passengers from Australia in the Peninsular and Oriental mail steamships who have, through the admission on board at Aden of Bombay passengers, to undergo quarantine at Brindisi and Marseilles; and whether arrangements will be made with the Peninsular and Oriental Company which, without loss to the Company, will obviate this inconvenience, in view of the large number of Australian passengers coming to England this year?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General's attention has not been directed officially, either by the contractors or by the passengers concerned, to the alleged inconvenience suffered by passengers on board the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamers, through the admission on board at Aden of Bombay passengers, to undergo quarantine at Brindisi and Marseilles. The Postmaster General does not see, however, what arrangements could be made by him to obviate the alleged inconvenience, and he cannot regard it as in accord with the duty of his Department to incur any expense in the matter.

LABOURER'S COTTAGE (IRELAND).

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is yet in a position to say why James Donohue has refused to give possession of the cottage and land provided by the Kildysart Board of Guardians for a labourer named Thomas Ayers?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The difficulty in this case arose from the fact that Mr. Donohue desired to utilise the material of the old house in which Ayers lived in order to fence in the plot on which the new cottage was being erected, but Ayers refused to give up possession. The Guardians have ordered that, unless the new cottage was completed by the 9th instant, proceedings were to be taken against the contractor and his sureties.

GAMBLING IN OPTIONS AND FUTURES.

Mr. W. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will obtain information from the British Consul in Berlin respecting the terms of the German Law prohibiting gambling in futures; and whether he can obtain details as to the administration and effect of the law since its introduction in January 1897?

Mr. HANBURY (on behalf of Mr. Ritchie): Some information giving the more prominent provisions of the new German law was published in the Board of Trade Journal in September last, and the Board will endeavour to obtain through the Foreign Office a report by the lately appointed Commercial Attaché at Berlin respecting the administration of the law and its effect during the short time it has been in operation.

Mr. FIELD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the administration of the Canadian law prohibiting gambling in futures, whether of stocks or merchandise; and whether he will obtain evidence to show what has been the effect of this legislation during the past three years in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. HANBURY (on behalf of Mr. Ritchie): Yes, Sir; the Board of Trade will ask the Colonial Office to obtain a Report from the Canadian Government upon the administration of the law referred to, and what has been the effect.

LAND TAX.

Mr. LAURENCE HARDY (Kent, Ashford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether in assessing the Land Tax the Local Commissioners have any power to adopt as the basis of their valuation an old Income Tax assessment of 1893 instead of the assessment for 1896-7; and whether the Local Commissioners have any power to make a second demand upon payers of Land Tax who have already paid their quota of the tax in accordance with the demand made upon them, and who hold receipts for the payment of Land Tax for the current year?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): New assessments under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts are made quinquennially, and, consequently, the assessment made in 1893, as modified in particular cases by subsequent appeals, is still in force, and would be properly used for the purposes of Section 31 (1) of the Finance Act, 1896. The Commissioners of Land Tax for any parish have to raise the full quota charged against the parish, or so much of it as does not exceed the amount which would be raised by a rate of 1s. in the pound on the "annual value" of the unexonerated properties. If their assessment fails to produce the required sum in full, they have power to raise the deficiency by a reassessment of those properties.

Mr. LAURENCE HARDY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will be able to lay upon the Table of the House, before the discussion takes place on the Budget, a copy of the circular to the Land Tax authorities which he has instructed the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to issue?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No, Sir; I do not think this can be done. What I undertook was, that this circular should be issued before the next Land Tax assessments are made.

BELFAST ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOL.

MR. F. B. MILDMAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he would explain to the House under what circumstances the decision of the Education Department in 1893, with reference to the placing of the Roman Catholic school at Buckfast on the list of schools receiving an annual grant, was last year reversed?

MR. HANBURY (on behalf of Sir J. GORST): The Roman Catholic school was refused annual grants by the Education Department under a mistaken interpretation of the law, which has now been corrected in consequence of an opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Education Department did not consider that, under such circumstances, the refusal should be continued.

GOLD COAST.

MR. D. F. GODDARD (Ipswich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the effect of recent legislation on the Gold Coast, namely, the Supreme Court Amendment Ordinance, 1897, and the District Commissioners Ordinance, 1897, will be, that the natives will be largely deprived of the safeguard of trial by jury, which they have enjoyed in the British Courts for the last 50 years; whether Her Majesty's Judges at the Gold Coast were consulted before the recent legislation on the administration of justice; whether he has received a request from the local Bar, praying him to withhold his advice to Her Majesty to give the Royal Assent to these Ordinances, pending the receipt of a memorial on the subject; and whether he has been able to grant such petition?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The first mentioned ordinance only substitutes a quarterly for a monthly assize. The second extends the summary jurisdiction of the District Commissioners, but only makes general a jurisdiction which had been previously conferred by the Chief Justice under his statutory powers on the District Commissioners of certain districts. The Chief Justice is a member of the Legislative Council by which these ordinances were passed. I have not received any petition with regard to them.

Mr. Laurence Hardy.

MR. GODDARD: May I ask whether I am correctly informed that there are now 84 offences which can be tried by the District Commissioner?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That does not arise out of the Question. If the hon. Gentleman wants particulars he must give notice.

POSTAL CHARGES.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, as the postal charges between Austria-Hungary and Germany, between the United States and Canada, and between France and Algeria are identical with the domestic rates of the country of origin in each instance, any doubt can be entertained as to the right of the United Kingdom to enter into similar arrangements with the Governments of other parts of the Empire; and whether, instead of merely strongly urging the recognition of this right, as the Government has already undertaken to do, an authoritative declaration of the complete freedom of action of the various postal authorities of the British Empire will be made at the forthcoming Postal Union Congress?

*MR. HANBURY: The circumstances in the cases which my right hon. Friend has instanced are not the same as in the case of the United Kingdom and its Colonies, the mails to and from many of the British Colonies having to pass through foreign countries and paying transit rates to the country of transit.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that we are bound not to make any arrangement with our own Colonies?

MR. HANBURY: No, I do not wish my right hon. Friend to understand that at all.

LIVERPOOL DOCKS (LOADING ACCIDENTS).

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the large number of accidents which occur at the Liverpool Docks in connection with the loading of vessels owing mainly to defective machinery; and whether the Board of Trade can enforce stricter regulations with a view to reduce the number of preventible accidents?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: My attention has been drawn to this matter. Accidents in the Liverpool Docks have been numerous; but it is not correct to say that they are mainly due to defective machinery. The statements on the subject which have appeared in the local papers I believe to be exaggerated. So far as the accidents are due to preventible causes, the Factory Inspectors will use every means in their power to secure the safety of the workmen.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Colonel BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether all the arrangements for the representation of the Militia force at the Jubilee Procession on 22nd June have been completed, or whether applications will still be received from the Commanding Officers of regiments which are out at that time for their annual training to send detachments for duty on that day?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Powell-Williams, Birmingham, S.): The arrangements are not yet completed; but applications from Officers Commanding are not required, as due notification will be made to those regiments which will be represented.

Mr. FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, Shipley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, having regard to the character of the services of the Royal Naval Reserve officers and men, it will be possible to arrange for their representation in the Jubilee Procession?

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): My hon. Friend may be assured that the claims of the Royal Naval Reserve to representation in the Jubilee Procession have not been overlooked.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in connection with the Diamond Jubilee celebration, there is any intention of causing the loss of a day's pay to Government employés either on the 21st or 22nd June; and, if so, whether he will take steps to put a stop to an enforced holiday with loss of pay, which would be a serious matter to numbers of Government workers on wages as low as 19s. and 20s. a week.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): The spending department of the War Office and Admiralty propose that there should be a holiday and full life upon Jubilee Day, Tuesday, June 22. They also propose, as is usual when there is a holiday on Tuesday, that the works should not be in operation on the Monday, but they will take care that steps are taken which may prevent any obligatory loss of earnings to the men.

FERTILISERS AND FEEDING STUFFS BILL.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has received a memorial from the Royal Northern Agricultural Society, suggesting various Amendments to the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Bill; and whether he will consider these suggestions sympathetically when he reconsiders the Act with a view to its Amendment?

*The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Walter Long, Liverpool, West Derby): I have received the memorial to which the hon. Member refers, and I shall be happy to give my very careful consideration to the suggestions which it contains.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Dr. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, seeing how short-handed the Army Medical Department is at Home, and the difficulty of getting leave, he will arrange some system of relief so as to enable medical officers to obtain leave according to regulations?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Arrangements are in progress which, it is hoped, will afford greater facilities to military medical orders for obtaining leave.

TOKAT MASSACRE.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has received any further information as to the massacre of Armenians at Tokat on 19th March; whether he can give the number of Armenians murdered and the number of houses looted on that occasion; and whether the Turkish Governor at Tokat took no steps to protect the Armenians, but rather encouraged the massacre?

Mr. CURZON: On March 25th Sir P. Currie reported that Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Sivas (Major Bulman) and the Russian Vice Consul at Samsoun were to go to Tokat as representing the six Embassies to watch the proceedings of the Turkish Commissioners. On March 31st Major Bulman reported that 89 persons had been killed, and 36 wounded, and 250 houses pillaged at Tokat, and that four neighbouring villages had been pillaged; 24 houses in them looted, and 35 of their inhabitants killed. Her Majesty's Ambassador was informed by the Foreign Minister, on the 4th inst., of the arrest of Hakki Pasha, the Military Commandant at Tokat, who had been reported by both the French and British Vice Consuls as principally responsible for the massacre, and whose arrest and dismissal had been demanded by the Ambassadors. On the 7th inst. Sir Philip Currie heard from Major Bulman that there had been 185 arrests at Tokat. The Commandant was ordered to Erzingian, but Major Bulman protested and demanded his trial. In connection with the Tokat massacres the Vali of Sivas, the Governor of Tokat, the Commander of Gendarmerie, and the Commissioner of Police have already been dismissed.

NAVAL GUNS.

Captain NORTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will consider the suggestion recently made by a distinguished naval officer as to re-arming 17 of the 45 vessels in commission or Reserve at present armed with muzzle-loading guns of an obsolete pattern, seeing that the total expense would probably scarcely exceed a million sterling, that our effective naval force would thus be increased, and moreover a saving take place by the reduction of a number of ships which are only nominally effective?

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: This Question is under the careful consideration of the Admiralty, but it is too large and important to be properly dealt with in reply to a Question across the floor of the House. The Question had better be reserved for some favourable opportunity.

MILITIA TRAINING (QUEEN'S COUNTY).

Dr. McDONNELL (Queen's Co., Leix): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to the fact that for 10 years the Roman Catholic members of Militia regiments in training in Queen's County were marched on holidays of obligation to Church as on Sundays; whether this practice has been departed from in recent years; is he aware that the present Colonel did not march them last year or give them permission to go, but had them employed in drill or other work; and whether the War Office authorities will see that Roman Catholic members of Irish Militia regiments will be afforded opportunities of practising their religion on all holidays of obligation?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I am informed that the practice has not been departed from in recent years, and that every facility is given to Roman Catholic members of Irish Militia regiments for practising their religion on such holidays.

MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL.

Mr. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he is aware that the Middlesex County Council have proposed to make a bye-law, under Section 16 of the Local Government Act 1888, punishing as a criminal offence the use of abusive language in any house, building, garden, or other place abutting on or near to a street or public place; (2) whether the words "to the annoyance of any person in such street or public place" are contained in the draft bye-law; and (3) if such bye-law has been proposed, whether he has sanctioned or intends to sanction it?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The draft bye-law referred to has been submitted to me by the Council, and it does not contain the words mentioned in the second paragraph of the Question. Even, however, with this limitation it appears to me to be somewhat too wide, and I have asked the Council to confine it to cases where the abusive language is such as to put some person in actual fear or to cause a breach of the peace.

BRIXTON PRISON.

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Prison Commissioners propose to re-open Brixton Prison as an establishment for training convicts in handicraft occupations?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Brixton prison is still in the temporary possession of the War Office Authorities, and nothing has been decided as to the uses to which it shall be put if it ceases to be needed for military purposes.

SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION (HEYWOOD).

Mr. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, notwithstanding that in June 1895 the Education Department, in reply to their request, informed the Town Council of Heywood that an Order would be forthwith issued for the election of a School Board for the borough, the Department has now, after a third request from the Town Council, declined to issue the Order, alleging that that body does not represent the wishes of a majority of the ratepayers; whether the Department has any authority under Section 12 of the Education Act of 1870 to refuse for such a reason to act upon a statutory resolution of a municipal corporation in favour of the formation of a School Board, and whether there is any precedent for the adoption of such a course; and whether the land has been acquired, or more than a small portion of the required funds has been raised, for the additional school accommodation which, it is stated, is in course of being supplied, and how long a time is likely to elapse before such accommodation is provided?

Mr. HANBURY (on behalf of Sir J. Gorst): The Department has declined to issue the Order. The words of Section 12 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870 are: "The Education Department may, if they think fit, cause a School Board to be formed." These words vest a discretion in the Department. There is a precedent for the course taken, in the case of Winchester in 1875. As regards the concluding part of the hon. Member's Question, the Department has made inquiries of the inspector, but have not yet received a reply.

CRETE.

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a Supplementary Estimate will be submitted to defray the costs of the operations now being carried on in the Island of Crete?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: So far as can be at present foreseen there will be no necessity for a Supplementary Estimate to defray the cost of the transport and maintenance of the British contingent in Crete.

INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE (JUDICIAL BRANCH).

Mr. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that in some provinces of India the judicial branch of the Indian Civil Service is being encroached upon and its proper functions circumscribed by the appointment of Revenue Officers to perform judicial work; and that in some instances the trial of Sessions cases has been transferred to District Magistrates, who presumably are without adequate judicial training; and is this partial supersession of the provincial judiciary of India due to the exercise of the power given to the Executive Authorities under the amended Criminal Procedure Code, to invest District Magistrates and other Revenue Officers with judicial functions; and, if so, will inquiry be made as to the desirability of these provisions of the Code being revised or restricted, so that the confidence of the people in the administration of justice may be maintained?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not aware that the judicial branch of the Service is being encroached upon. It is true that local governments in the non-regulation provinces have the power of investing District Magistrates with authority to try offences not punishable with death; but this power was not conferred by the amended code; it has existed for 25 years, and I am not aware that it has been exercised more freely of late than at any former time, nor have I any reason to think that the existing law requires alteration.

HIGHWAY ROBBERIES (LONDON).

MR. THOMAS B. CURRAN (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to repeated recent cases of violent personal assault with robbery, committed after nightfall in South London, especially the Borough; and whether he will take immediate steps to strengthen the ordinary or detective police force, which at present appears insufficient?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, Sir, my attention has not been called to repeated recent cases of this kind occurring in South London. Not more than seven cases of anything approaching assault with robbery are known by the police to have occurred since the beginning of the year, and in all of these arrests were made at the time. There appears to me to be no necessity for increasing the strength of the force as suggested.

LOCAL BYE-LAWS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been drawn to the practical extension of the criminal law through the enactment of bye-laws by local authorities in other than sanitary matters, and especially to the novel and extended exercise recently of the power to make bye-laws for good rule and government conferred by Section 23 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and by Section 16 of the Local Government Act, 1888; and whether, having regard to the fact that, in the year 1895 no fewer than 74,703 persons were committed to prison in default of payment of fines, out of a total number of 142,579 persons committed to prison, he will consider whether it woud be advisable to impose further restrictions on the creation of new criminal offences by bye-law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): My attention has not been called to the matter referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, but I understand that the Home Office insist on all bye-laws being submitted in draft, that they are carefully examined and criticised, and that the Secretary of State constantly requires the withdrawal of bye-laws which appear likely to be oppressive or too stringent in their operation. I am not prepared, upon the information before me, to say that any further restrictions are necessary.

IVORY (CASE OF MR. EDWARD).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Mr. Edward Ivory, an American citizen, who was imprisoned in London for four months, has made a claim on the Government for damages for false imprisonment; and whether this claim has yet reached the Government; and, if so, what action the Government intend to take in the matter.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No such claim as that to which the hon. Member refers has been received at the Foreign Office.

KINGSTOWN HARBOUR ROADS BILL.

MR. HORACE PLUNKETT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Town Commissioners and inhabitants of Kingstown are much aggrieved at the withdrawal of the Kingstown Harbour Roads Bill; whether the Treasury will consent to the re-introduction of the Bill next Session; and whether it is possible to make such arrangements in the meantime as will place the inhabitants of Kingstown in the position with respect to these roads which they would have occupied if the Bill had not been opposed and consequently withdrawn?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The Bill to which my hon. Friend refers was withdrawn because it belongs to a class of Measures which can only be properly treated as public Bills if they are practically unopposed. In such Bills no questions of general policy are involved, and they are merely introduced as public Bills to save the cost to the locality of promoting them as private Bills. I am not aware of any objection to the re-introduction of the Bill next Session, but the conditions I have laid down must be held to apply to this and similar cases, and I cannot promise to find Parliamentary time for Measures of this description.

BIMETALLISM.

Mr. FIELD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been directed to a Resolution passed unanimously at a public lecture in the Dublin Trades Council Hall, in which they deplore the evils arising from the instability of the par of exchange, and call upon the Government to carry out the House of Commons Resolution of 17th March 1896 by returning to the system of international bimetallism; and whether the Government intend to take any measures to promote an international conference upon the subject?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I am not aware that I can add anything to what I said in March of last Session, when I stated that I knew no circumstances which would induce me to suppose that anything would be gained by the initiative being taken in this matter by Her Majesty's Government.

ENLISTMENT REGULATIONS.

Captain PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to its being impossible to have the Debate on the system of enlistment in the British Army, for which the first place had been obtained in the ballot for to-morrow, and in view of the close connection which this question bears to the health of the troops in India, on which subject a Report of the Departmental Committee and a Memorandum of the Secretary of State for India has recently been issued, the Government will be prepared to give a day for the discussion of a matter of such urgent public importance after the Easter recess?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I doubt whether a discussion on the second of the topics mentioned in the Question would be relevant to a Debate upon the first; nor do I know that any circumstance has yet been brought to my knowledge that would induce me to believe that it was necessary or desirable to interrupt the general course of public business in this House for the purpose of promoting a discussion either upon the one or the other.

VENEZUELAN BOUNDARIES.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the proposed Treaty on the Venezuelan Boundaries has been agreed to by the United States Government; and, if not, what position is the question in at present; and, what further action does Her Majesty's Government intend to take in the matter?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The Treaty between Great Britain and Venezuela was signed on February 2. Its main provisions had been previously discussed and agreed upon by the Government of the United States. It has been recently confirmed by the Venezuelan Congress, and the exchange of the ratification will shortly be effected.

SCHOOL INSPECTORS (SCOTLAND).

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked whether the Lord Advocate would consent to the following Motion standing in his name:—

> "Copy or extracts of recent correspondence between the Sub-Inspectors of Schools in Scotland and the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education in Scotland on the subject of appointments to the office of Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools."

The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): I am afraid that I cannot agree to the Motion of my hon. Friend. It is not in accordance with the usual official custom to give such correspondence; but we shall be glad to give him any information on the subject dealt with in the letters if he will apply for it privately.

SWINE FEVER (ESSEX).

MR. J. ROUND (Essex, Harwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can see his way to relax the existing restrictions in the County of Essex, which were imposed by the Board in consequence of outbreaks of swine fever last year?

*MR. LONG: I am happy to say that a considerable improvement in the position as regards swine fever in the North-East of Essex has taken place, and although it can hardly be hoped that the disease has been entirely extinguished, I think that the time has come when some modification of the existing regulations can safely be allowed. An Order has therefore been issued, withdrawing the severe restrictions of the Infected Areas Order, as from the 17th inst., and substituting the milder precautions of the Suspected Zones Order, a Measure which will give substantial relief to owners of pigs in the district.

BRITISH SOUTH AFRICA COMPANY (SIR RICHARD MARTIN'S REPORT).

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can now tell us when he will produce the Report of Sir Richard Martin. I understand it has already been presented to the Committee on South Africa, because I see a reference to it in the newspapers.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Report of Sir Richard Martin has been produced and laid before the Committee on South Africa in accordance with a promise I gave to some of the Members. I think it is rather unusual to produce prematurely Papers which form part of the material on which a Committee of this kind has to decide, but if my right hon. Friend desires that the matter should be further considered, I shall be glad to do so. Meanwhile I may add that the representatives of the Chartered Company have complained of some statements in Sir Richard Martin's Report which they assert to be inaccurate, and they have asked me to present a counter-statement as soon as they hear from their authorities, and, further, they ask that their statement should be presented at the same time as that of Sir Richard Martin. That, I think, is a fair request, and, even if the Report is laid on the Table, I think it desirable to wait until the reply of the Chartered Company can be presented at the same time.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

*MR. E. BAINBRIDGE (Lincoln, Gainsborough) asked the First Lord of the Treasury a Question of which he had given him private notice—what reply to the Question marked (b) in paragraph 4 of the Questions addressed to the managers of Voluntary Schools last Friday (and which requests them to state why a school is necessitous), would enable them to get relief? [Laughter.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I am glad the hon. Member has had an opportunity of explaining his Question, because it was only five minutes ago that the enigmatic utterance was placed in my hand. I find nothing at all bearing on the Question, and I was hopelessly puzzled as to what was the information desired. If the hon. Member will put the Question on the Paper during the holidays I will make full investigation. [Laughter.]

*MR. BAINBRIDGE: The right hon. Gentleman is referring to one Paper, and my Question refers to another.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right right hon. Gentleman has said that he is not in a position to answer the Question.

MR. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) asked whether there would be laid before Parliament the circular of the Education Department to managers of Voluntary Schools and the accompanying Minute in reference to the carrying out of the provisions of the Voluntary Schools Act.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I imagine that there will be no objection, but I must inquire of the Department to find out.

CAPE COLONY (VAAL DRIFTS).

MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick) asked whether the Papers as to the closing of the Vaal drifts by the Government of the South African Republic in October 1895, were about to be laid before the Cape Legislature, and whether he would lay similar correspondence on the Table of the House.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, I have an intimation from the Government of Cape Colony to the effect that they desire to lay these Papers on the Table, and they have asked our assent, which we have readily accorded; and in these circumstances I propose to lay the Papers on the Table of this House.

LAW OF EVIDENCE (CRIMINAL CASES) BILL.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked whether a week's notice would be given before the Committee stage of this Bill was taken?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Yes, I think it will be possible; but the hon. Gentleman should consult my hon. Friend in charge of the Bill. I will let him know in the course of the evening.

MOTIONS.

STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES' JURISDICTION (SCOTLAND).

Bill to extend the Jurisdiction of Stipendiary Magistrates in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by the Lord Advocate and Mr. Anstruther; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday 26th April, and to be printed.—[Bill 202.]

BURIAL GROUNDS LOANS (SCOTLAND).

Bill to extend the period of Repayment of Loans for Burial Grounds in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by the Lord Advocate and Mr. Anstruther; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday 26th April, and to be printed.—[Bill 203.]

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE (EASTER).

CRETE.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY moved,

"That this House at its rising do Adjourn till Monday, April 26; that the Government business as far as and including the Order for the Committee on the Railway Assessors (Scotland) Superannuation Bill may be entered upon this night at any hour, though opposed, and be not interrupted under the provisions of the Standing Order, Sittings of the House; and that, as soon as such business is disposed of, Mr. Speaker do Adjourn the House without question put."

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that on the eve of an Adjournment for the Easter vacation, somewhat longer than it had been of recent years, some attention ought to be called to the fact that this year it was unfortunately not unlikely that events of importance concerning the policy of the Government might occur in the course of the vacation. A few weeks ago—even a few days ago—there appeared to be some prospect that the House might have an opportunity to Debate the policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect to Crete. But about ten days ago it became clear that the Government did not intend to propose any vote of money on which the movements of British troops in Crete might be discussed, and the refusal of the Leader of the House to give a day for the Motion down last week in the name of the Leader of the Opposition made it clear that no other opportunity for discussion was to be afforded to the House. The grounds which were given by the Leader of the House for refusing time to consider that Motion were, he thought, unusual. In the period between 1877 and 1880 a considerable number of Motions made by the Opposition were treated as Votes of Censure, and time was given to discuss them as such by the Government of the day. Half of those Motions were of a character similar to the Motion of his right hon. Friend—[cheers]—and some of them at least involved a Censure far less direct, far more hypothetical, than was the case with his right hon. Friend's Motion. [Cheers.] That was notably the case with regard to the famous Resolutions of Mr. Gladstone on the Eastern question. Those Resolutions were put down by an illustrious private Member without the support of his Leader; they were modified, and ultimately obtained the assent of the Leader of the Opposition; but the majority of the five Resolutions were not couched in terms of direct Censure on the Government. The Resolution on which the Debate of four nights and the Division took place contained no Censure at all directed against the Government, but it indicated a counter-policy, and if it had been adopted by the House the result would have entailed loss of office on Ministers. It was therefore treated as a Vote of Censure. The Resolutions were rejected by an overwhelming majority. It was said that the Liberal Party was not united on this question. He believed that the Liberal Party was absolutely united in the House in support of the Motion of which notice had been given by his right hon. Friend, and he believed that, without any exception, its Members would be found supporting it. [Ironical laughter.] The Leader of the House declared that the Motion was in some degree a hypothetical Motion regarding the future. If, however, Motions with regard to foreign affairs were not inevitably to be too late, and to be of no influence on the policy of the country, they must be in some sense hypothetical and have regard to the future. He remembered a Vote of Censure of which private notice was given which was couched in the same terms as regarded hypothesis and the future as the Motion of his right hon. Friend. It was a Motion which made it impossible that the Government of the day should take a particular course with regard to Zebehr Pasha and the Soudan. There was no difference of opinion between the two sides with regard to the history of the agent whom they proposed to employ; but the question was whether, in the circumstances of the moment, it was desirable to employ him. Before a decision had been come to on the question, Mr. Forster gave notice of a Motion in the same terms as the Motion of his right hon. Friend. The Opposition believed that they had behind them on this question the opinion of the majority of the nation. [Cheers and derisive laughter.] He undoubtedly believed that. [Cheers.] Hon. Members could only trust to the communications they received from various parts of the country, and he believed that never had so many Conservatives and Liberal Unionists cut themselves adrift from party ties as on this question. The Leader of the House had said that the forces of the Crown were being used in Crete for the purpose only of protecting the Mussulman minority, and that the purpose of the blockade of the mainland was simply the maintenance of peace. If that were a correct description of the use to which the forces of the Crown were being put, but little objection would be raised by the Opposition; but how could this policy pacify the interior of Crete? At best it would be a policy of "patching up," and would not solve the Cretan question. As to the blockade, it might result in upsetting the Greek Kingdom and rendering the continued presence of Greek troops on the frontier impossible; but would it result in restoring order in Crete? It had been shown that it was the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and possibly of some others, that there should be an immediate withdrawal of Turkish troops from Crete, but it appeared that some of the partners in the Concert of Europe were not so willing to bring that about. There were constant interchanges of views between the capitals of Europe as to the means which ought to be adopted to bring it about, and, in the present state of Europe and the Greek frontier, this was a difficult business which was undoubtedly rendered more difficult by the absence of the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary. They knew that when the Government first came into office the Armenian question went to sleep while the Prime Minister was at Dieppe in the autumn of 1895. The country did not even know whether the Concert of Europe was in the least united. For all it knew, there might be an almost insuperable difference of opinion among the various Powers. Was the policy of Germany and Russia, for example, the same as our own? ["Hear, hear!"] The policy of Her Majesty's Government was a policy of autonomy in Crete as opposed to the very clear and direct policy of union with Greece. That was, no doubt, an honest policy on their part, but was it an equally honest policy on the part of Germany and Russia? These Powers had not shown such friendliness towards the Greek Democracy, or the patriotic Prince who presided over the destinies of Greece, as to render it indisputable that that was an honest policy on their part. The Leader of the House had taunted the Opposition for opposing the policy of autonomy, or policy of Home Rule for Crete as he had called it. They had not, however, opposed a policy of Home Rule for Crete as they understood Home Rule. What they meant by Home Rule was union under a

Crown to which the people were either already friendly or to which they would be made friendly by the policy of autonomy in the sense of Home Rule. The autonomy which he regarded with suspicion was the autonomy which he feared Russia or Germany had in view when talking of the autonomy of Crete under Turkish rule. It was a curious fact that both the Sultan of Turkey and the King of Greece held the same language with regard to the circumstances which had brought their armies face to face. They said:—

> "We were carrying on negotiations between ourselves with reference to the future of Crete, and we were on the point of arriving at a determination, and now we are brought to the verge of war by the action of the Powers and the Concert of Europe."

The Government believed that the Cretans had always asked for autonomy, but having examined closely the history of Crete since 1826 he had failed to find that the Cretans had ever asked for autonomy as distinguished from union with Greece. In the war of independence the Cretans asked for union with their brethren on the mainland, and at the time of the treaty of 1827 the islands of Greece therein mentioned were thought by the Whig Party to include Crete. In 1828 the Cretans were blockaded by the fleets of England and France, the object being to protect them against the Turks. In 1830 the Cretans had risen again, and the following Motion was proposed in the House of Lords:—

> "That no plan for the pacification of Greece can be approved as advantageous or honourable to His Majesty's Crown which does not give to that country a territory sufficient to maintain a national defence."

Lord Holland, speaking on this Motion, said:—

> "The day will come when we shall rue the errors of which our Government have been guilty; . . . . when our neglect of the opportunity of adding Candia to the territories of Greece will reflect upon ourselves with a force of which no man can see the remote consequences. However wise, however prudent the head of the Greek Government may be, he must either connive at his own subjects carrying on clandestine intercourse with the insurgents in Candia, or he must openly espouse the cause of their oppressed brethren. If such be his determination, what, then, will be the consequence? A new war, which may embroil all the Powers of Europe."

Lord John Russell and Lord Palmerston expressed similar views, and Sir James Mackintosh said:—

> "Candia is essential to the safety of Greece and cannot be excluded from its territory without endangering the existence of the new State."

Grattan called attention to the same subject on June 8, and O'Connell expressed the admiration that he felt for Prince Leopold on account of his refusal of the Crown of Greece upon the ground that Crete was not included. From 1827 to 1830 the Cretans were fighting for union with Greece, and in the insurrection of 1841 the same motive was apparent. Then the Turks met the great rising in 1866 by an offer of full autonomy, and that offer was unanimously declined by the Cretan insurgents, on the ground that they were fighting for independence and union with Greece. In 1878 they again put forward the same pretensions, which were voiced by their delegates at the Congress of Berlin. France and Italy took note of their declaration, but suddenly there came the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and a compromise was agreed to by the Powers. In 1879 this matter was taken up in this country by a large number of persons, whose votes prevailed at the election in 1880. In 1879 Lord Rosebery and Lord Lansdowne put their names to a declaration that the possession of Crete was within the legitimate aspirations of the Greek people, and that the interests of peace required the annexation of the island to Greece. Now they never should have been able to carry out the compromise of 1882 if they had blindly followed the Concert, and if they had not gone forward by themselves. [Cheers.] It was that fact, and that fact alone, which carried out the compromise of 1882. The Concert failed as to the Armenians; they were out of reach; but as regarded the other two cases it succeeded. He now came to 1886. He was not concerned with defending that Government, because he was not a Member of it, but the right hon. Gentleman attacked it. [The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: "I did not attack it!"] There was a taunt across the Table. What was the history of the blockade of 1886? The Collective Note to Greece to demobilise her army and withdraw from the frontier was signed, not by Gentlemen on that side of the House, but by Lord Salisbury, in January 1886—["hear, hear!"]—and on the 26th of that month his right hon. Friend the present Secretary for the Colonies gave notice of his intention to oppose that policy. [Laughter.] Undoubtedly there was a considerable opposition to that policy, which was only obscured by the overwhelming importance of the Home Rule question, and which was defended on the ground of the continuity of their foreign policy. He was not in favour of the continuity theory, because it meant the withdrawal from the people of this country of the opportunity of expressing by their votes any views as to foreign affairs. ["Hear, hear!"] The Liberal Party were involved in the coercion of Greece in the name of peace entirely in consequence of this doctrine of continuity. What was the history of coercion in the present case? The Powers had not suddenly come together. They had been at the work for two years and a-half, and, having failed to coerce Turkey, they seemed to have been driven into the coercion of Greece. Then they were told that if they expressed a doubt as to the wisdom of the Concert, if they wished to take their own line, they should have the courage of their opinions. Did the Powers act together with regard to Armenia? Was it not stated that Russia protested against the coercion of Turkey, and went so far as to say that she would not allow it? Lord Salisbury was suddenly stirred out of his very slow and dragging action on this Cretan question, which resembled his action with regard to the Armenian question—["hear, hear!"]—by the dispatch of Greek troops and the appearance of Prince George of Greece. These were the events which forced the hands of the Powers, and, instead of being unwise, they were necessary for the existence of the Cretan people. ["Hear, hear!"] They would never be able to rob the Cretans of that freedom which that very action of Greece gave to them. The Liberal Party had been taunted with using the phrase "the holy alliance," and with objecting to the damping down in the name of peace of Cretan liberty. There was once a holy alliance which was just what they described the Concert of Europe to be at the present time. Even Lord Castlereagh would not go into it. He meant the holy alliance as it existed before Laybach, and especially in 1815-1817. They had heard the Prime Minister describe what had taken place as filibustering; but what was the action of Lord Palmerston as to Sicily? He prevented the other Powers from interfering with what would now be called filibustering. Nothing could equal the imbecility and helplessness which the Great Powers had shown in dealing with Crete, and which they would have continued to show had not the King of Greece by his action forced their hands. [Opposition cheers.]

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport) who was received with Ministerial cheers: The right hon. Baronet has made a speech which has contained a great deal of historical knowledge and research; but much of his history, and more particularly that which related to recent events, I cannot myself accept. I shall venture in one or two respects to correct him; but I hope he will excuse me for saying that really the greater part of his interesting speech was not very material to the issue now before the House. [Opposition cries of "Oh!" and Ministerial cheers.] I do not say that with any idea of disrespect to the right hon. Baronet; but I hope the House will excuse me if I at any rate try to confine what I have to say within the somewhat narrow limits imposed upon us by the exigencies of the present moment. There is one complaint that I think cannot be made in reference to this Cretan question. No one can complain that there has been any lack of opportunity for criticising the conduct of the Government on the one hand or for defending it on the other during the past two months. ["Hear, hear!"] I have been refreshing my Parliamentary memory, and I find that in the last two months we have had the adjournment of the House moved three times on this question of Crete; we have had two discussions in Committee of Supply; there have been important speeches made in another place by the Secretary of State; and although it is true—as the right hon. Baronet rather unjustly taunted us—that we have not had our Vote of Censure, and although we have not yet persuaded the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition to repeat in this House that martial oration that we so much admired at Norwich—[laughter and cheers]—it is just possible that that is a pleasure that lies before us this afternoon. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] In any case it is true that we have had in the space of less than two months no fewer than six Debates on this question in the House of Commons; and if I look at what has passed in foreign countries during the same time, I find that in the French Chamber there have been only two such Debates, and in the Parliaments of Austria, Italy, and Germany, there has only been one in each case; so that if the appetite for political information in this country is as much greater than it is on the Continent as is often claimed, so also has it had abundant opportunity for satisfaction. ["Hear, hear!"] A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition, in anticipating the Debate of this afternoon, before we separate for the recess, asked that some statement should be made on behalf of the Government of their case. I confess I should have thought that our statement of policy in regard to Crete had been made so frequently as to become tedious by virtue of recapitulation; and I shall not recapitulate it at any length this afternoon. Perhaps, however, I may be permitted briefly to summarise it, and in so doing I will also deal with one or two points stated by the right hon. Baronet. I first take the question of autonomy. The right hon. Baronet complained once more that no clear or definite definition had been given of that word. If we look to the proclamation that was issued to the people of Crete we find it contains this definition, which to my mind is perfectly clear and satisfactory—that it is to imply "freedom from all control of the Porte in internal affairs." Then the right hon. Baronet says,

> "This may be your policy, and I give you all credit for honesty; but I cannot speak similarly of the other Powers;"

and he seems to harbour dark suspicions that this policy of autonomy upon which the Great Powers have conjointly and with absolute sincerity embarked is one that is put forward by ourselves alone, and from which certain of our allies are keeping in the background. I can with truth say there is no ground whatever for those suspicions. [Ministerial cheers.] There is no reason to suppose that the autonomy which this Government desires to make definite, absolute, ample, and clear is looked at from any other point of view by the other Powers. [Ministerial cheers.] Then the right hon. Gentleman says the Powers have interfered to prevent an arrangement being arrived at between the Sultan of Turkey and the King of Greece. Nothing has astonished me more in the history of the past few weeks than the extraordinary amount of information, entirely unconfirmed by what we know, which appears to be in the possession of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. It may be that those negotiations have taken place; but neither we nor the other Powers know anything about them, so that this particular charge that an arrangement has been prevented by the other Powers cannot be sustained. [Ministerial cheers.] Of course, the realisation of this autonomy and the promulgation of a new Constitution for Crete must depend, in the first place, upon the restoration of order in the island. Anyone that reads the papers must see that there are several obstacles to the restoration of order. Some of these are inherent in the nature of the present circumstances, but are, I think, capable of modification. Among these may be counted the presence of the Turkish troops in the island to which so much attention has been drawn, about which the views of Her Majesty's Government are very well known, and the importance of dealing with which we have never ceased to press upon our allies. Then there are other obstacles which may, I think, rather be called artificial than inherent in this character. Among those is the presence of the Greek troops in the island. If we look back to the answer made by the Greek Government to one of the Notes of the Powers, we find they defended the dispatch of Greek troops to Crete as being justified by the dictates of humanity. I for one have no desire to dispute that explanation; but I do not think that any one can contend that the dictates of humanity are being served by the continued presence of the Greek troops in the island. [Ministerial cheers.] Here are these Greek troops acting in violation of the expressed desires of the Powers—["hear, hear!"]—preventing that autonomy being given to the island which has been promised, and practically claiming the right to annex the island of

Crete to Greece. I have often said before that I really believe the retirement of the Greek troops from Crete would open wide the door which would lead almost immediately to a pacific settlement of this question; and I have always regretted very much that hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentleman opposite have not exercised that influence they are said to possess with the Greek Government in that direction. [Cheers and laughter.] It is because those Greeks have not been withdrawn that, as the House knows, a blockade of the coast of Crete has been maintained by the Admirals of the allied fleets since March 21, and simultaneously the Powers have with contingents occupied the principal ports on the coast, and have placed under their protection many thousands of helpless and defenceless persons of both sexes and all ages, who, but for that humane protection from the Powers, must have suffered terribly. [Cheers.] They have further done very good work—I am making these points in answer to the contention of the right hon. Baronet, that the action of the Powers throughout has been characterised by helplessness and imbecility—they have done inestimable work in relieving the people and in saving thousands of lives. But it may be said that there has been a great deal of fighting between the insurgents and the forces of the Powers. It is unfortunately the case that the insurgents, in face of the reiterated and explicit warnings that have been addressed to them and have reached them, as we know, from the Admirals, have persisted in their endeavours to starve out the Turkish garrisons in the outlying posts; to get command of those outposts that command the towns where are stationed the contingents of the forces of the Powers; to cut off the water supply of the towns; and even to engage in hostilities with the European officers and troops. With all that we are familiar. But I am glad to say that within the last few days the situation in the island does appear to be a little quieter. The humane and pacific mission of the Admirals is beginning to be understood. They have succeeded in restraining the Turkish troops from disorder and excesses, and the last step they took in the disarmament of the irregulars, or so-called Bashi-Bazouks, has had a very beneficial effect on the restoration and maintenance of order. In the meantime, as hon. Gentlemen opposite know very well, active discussions have been going on and are proceeding at this moment between the Powers as to the appointment of a governor, the institution of a Militia for the future preservation of order in the island, and as to the basis of the autonomous constitution which has been promised. Of course, while these negotiations are proceeding it would be most improper on my part, and no one in the House would ask me to enter into that; but I hope I have succeeded in giving, at any rate, in concise and accurate outline a résumé of what our policy has been and is in regard to Crete. I turn now for a moment to the mainland and the policy which the Government are pursuing in that direction. The Government have strained every nerve to prevent the outbreak of war, which they can only regard as calamitous to both Greece and Turkey, and as constituting a very grave menace to the peace of Europe. ["Hear, hear!"] They have shown the utmost forbearance in regard to the susceptibilities and sentiments of all concerned, and they have done everything in their power to prevent anything which might precipitate the outbreak of war. As the Leader of the House informed the House recently, Her Majesty's Government have declared their willingness in the last resort to join the other Powers of Europe, solely for the maintenance of peace, in carrying out that blockade, which, as we know, was enforced 11 years ago by right hon. Gentlement opposite—[cheers]—and in order to remove the necessity for any such operation, and to obviate the incentive to war which must inevitably arise from the assembling of these masses of men on the frontier, we have also taken part, as my right hon. Friend told the House last week, in a joint representation at Constantinople and at Athens, that the aggressor, whoever he may be, shall not be allowed to profit by his victory. [Cheers.] It is true that an unfortunate event happened upon the frontier three or four days ago; but the information we have received leads us to think that this was an entirely unauthorised raid, and that it was not participated in by any of the Greek regulars. It has also been disavowed by the Greek Government; while, on the other hand, the Government of Turkey has said that if these instances of provocation are not repeated they are not anxious to find in this particular one, as they might have done had they so chosen, a casus belli. [Cheers.] This is a brief résumé of the position of the Government in regard to the island and the mainland. I now come to another point. We have taken all these steps, not in isolation, but in conjunction with the other Powers, who are equally animated with a desire for peace. Of course, as the hon. Baronet said, there must be in a matter of this kind some difference of opinion; of course in any action resulting from these combined forces there must be a certain amount of give and take. Compromise is the very essence of any such combination, and every Power cannot carry its own particular will or way; but whatever these differences of detail may have been on the broad principles to be followed there has been no difference whatever between the Powers, and on this basis the Concert remains quite unimpaired. Within the walls of the Concert this country has undoubtedly used its influence in the interests of moderation and conciliation. [" Hear, hear! "] It has taken such steps as might, without loss of dignity to any of the parties concerned, lead to a pacific settlement of this question. It has been disposed to concede the utmost latitude to any disposition or suggestion that makes for the cause of peace, and has allowed every opportunity—opportunities I am glad to say not yet exhausted—for affording negotiations on this matter. Nevertheless the Concert is very much denounced, and the right hon. Baronet has joined in this popular declamation against these proceedings. On one point I must confess I think he did a grave injustice both to the Concert and to historical facts; he said the Concert had wholly failed to coerce Turkey on the question of Armenia. [Opposition cheers.] If I may be allowed to remind him, he is confusing two entirely different sets of circumstances. When Lord Salisbury came into office the Concert of Europe did not exist; there was a combination of three Powers which had been initiated, for many reasons by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. A particular situation having occurred in Armenia the Powers who had consular representatives there joined together to deal with it, and in this way the co-operation of certain Powers had been instituted. It was Lord Salisbury's policy, and his successful policy, to replace that combination, however justifiable, by the entire Concert of Europe. The difference between a concert and a combination is this; a concert means the whole of the six Powers, and a combination means a smaller number. [Opposition laughter.] I do not know whether my definition is very grammatical, but it is at any rate correct. [" Hear, hear! "] What is even more curious still is that in reconstituting the Concert of Europe, and in acting with it ever since, strange as it may appear, we have really been acting on the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition. I am, if I may say so, a most devoted and attentive student of his speeches, and in the course of last autumn I derived great consolation from what he said about Armenia. He made a speech on October 6, 1896, in his constituency in Wales, and this is what he said:—

> " What we want is that which used to be called an entente cordiale with foreign Powers, a friendly disposition which accommodates itself to the circumstances of the times as they present themselves, a little more international courtesy. I dare say I shall be told to-morrow that this is a poor-spirited policy by those who pride themselves on splendid isolation." [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] "I confess that I am not an admirer of the splendid isolation which results in a humiliating impotence. I prefer a cordial, good understanding; a neighbourly spirit ministers to the happiness of mankind."

Then a little later on he said:—

> " What should be our policy if we want to strengthen the hands of the Government? Let us give them an assurance that in cultivating the friendship of other Powers "—[cheers]—" they will have the cordial and steadfast support of national sentiment."

[Ministerial cheers.] Now we have been told this afternoon that national sentiment is represented exclusively on the opposite side of the House, and therefore really the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition ought to be the last person to object to us if we show that amount of deference to him which is involved in having adopted in the spring of this year the policy which he urged upon us in the autumn of last year. [Ministerial cheers.] I will take one other point in regard to what the right hon. Gentleman has said; he talked about the imbecility and helplessness of the Concert. Has the Concert even in this Cretan question been imbecile or helpless? During the last two months it has saved Europe from war. Is that no great achievement? From the start of this Cretan affair it has been the action of the Concert, and of the Concert alone, which has prevented Turkey from declaring war, and which has saved Crete from consequences much graver than any of those it has undergone. Nobody in this House can deny that, whatever may have been the motives of the action of Greece, that action was of a provocative character. Without declaring war, the Greeks assumed the rights of a belligerent without the responsibilities. They invaded an island belonging to another Power, they fired on Turkish vessels, attacked Turkish troops, and have since been in occupation of the island, and have massed large bodies of men, if not with the intention of making war, at any rate with the obvious intention of threatening war on the northern frontier of Greece. Suppose that we had adopted the advice of the right hon. Baronet. If there had been no Concert, or we had receded from the Concert, and had failed to put pressure on Turkey, what would have happened? Do you mean to say that the Turks would not have sent reinforcements to Crete, and would not 12,000 Turkish troops in this internecine warfare have carried havoc and extermination throughout that island, and on the northern frontier of Thessaly would not the Turkish forces, which are understood to be largely superior both in numbers and equipment, have crossed the frontier long ago, if the pressure of the Powers had not prevented that? ["Hear, hear!"] The Powers have done their best, and I think they have succeeded in localising the disturbance. In the case of Crete they have localised it by blockading that island rather than the Greek mainland, and by assuming responsibility for the island, and in the case of the frontier they have tried to localise the disturbance there by making the joint declaration that the aggressor will in neither case be allowed to profit by his victory. I have little more to say; but there is one argument that I should like to meet. It is said, your intentions may be excellent, but, oh! how dilatory and slow you are in executing them. Is that very remarkable? When you take the case of Crete, and remember that, not for generations, but for centuries, that island has been torn by internecine warfare, and that at the present moment there is this source of friction and misunderstanding in the conflicting and overlapping jurisdictions of the Admirals in the seaports, the Turks in the garrisons, the insurgents in the interior, and Colonel Vassos and the Greeks in his mountain fastness, can any sensible man expect pacification to be restored at once? I will take the really interesting and parallel case of Samos, which is habitually held out to us as a model which we ought to set before us. That was a State which was long part of the Turkish Empire, with a population, as in this case, mainly Greek, and though still remaining under the suzerainty of the Sultan it has acquired a constitution of an independent and satisfactory character. What happened in Samos? After the war of Greek independence in 1827, when the Powers declared that Samos should not be taken from Turkey, but should possess an autonomous constitution of its own, there was continuous fighting from 1827 to 1836. There were Collective Notes, blockades, incursions of Greek volunteers, Colonel Vassosses turning up by the score—almost every incident of the present situation was reproduced on a miniature scale at that time. And, although a constitution was given to Samos in 1832, it was not until 1850, after 23 years' fighting, disorder, and trouble, that the island settled down and accepted that autonomous constitution under which it has ever since lived. [Opposition cheers.] My desire is to point out that, if you now quote Samos as an instance, we ought to remember that the present constitution was not given to Samos without very many of those disorders which we are now combating.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs): In Samos they were fighting against Turkish soldiers.

MR. CURZON: I do not think so. I presume that everybody in this House is really agreed that the objects which the Government have set before themselves are the correct objects. [Opposition cries of "No!"] I am taking the objects as defined by my right hon. Friend behind me—the peace of Europe and the liberation of Crete. [Ministerial cheers.] There is nobody in this House who would dispute that those are objects which any Government ought to set before themselves. The question seems to me largely to turn on whether you ought to pursue that policy by yourselves or in Concert with the other Powers. When the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition says in a speech in the country that he and his Party have done with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and also says that integrity is the basis of the European Concert, it would seem—and I dare say he would not deny it—that that speech involves a disavowal and repudiation of the policy of the Concert; and when he moved the other day in this House for an Address to the Crown praying that the forces of the Crown might not be used against Crete or Greece—in other words that Great Britain should not pledge herself in advance as to the steps she might be called upon to take in assisting to carry out the policy of the Powers—what was that but tying the hands of the British Government and disrupting and disintegrating the Concert of Europe? If that is the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, instead of his calling upon us for a statement of our policy, which we have so often given from these Benches, ought we not to have some statement of policy from him? Either the Opposition have an alternative policy or they have not; if they have an alternative policy let us hear it in the House of Commons. [Loud cheers.] If they have not an alternative policy then let them cease to embarrass and hamper the Government by their attacks. There is only one reason why I feel glad that the Vote of Censure was not moved. Of course, if a Vote of Censure had been moved we should have had an overwhelming majority and should have extracted from that the consolation which large majorities never fail to give. But, after all, that is a cheap consolation; surely if no Vote of Censure is moved we are justified in inferring that there is a great body of sentiment, even on the opposite side of the House, that is in sympathy with our policy. ["Hear, hear!"] For my own part I think as long as we remain in the Concert of Europe, the power for good and the efficacy of this country is likely to be increased by the consciousness which will prevail abroad that we have behind us not merely a Party majority, but a large majority of the people of the country. [Ministerial cheers.]

*Sir WILLLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.), who rose amidst loud Opposition cheers: Sir, although the right hon. Gentleman has declined the challenge I offered—[Ministerial laughter and cheers]—I shall not decline his challenge to-night. [Opposition cheers.] I regretted, and still regret, that the House is to discuss matters of grave importance with reference to the future policy of this country in the presence of the great question which is upon us, the Eastern Question, upon a Motion of Adjournment. I am of opinion that that ought to have been discussed on a definite issue. [Ministerial cheers and Opposition counter cheers.] Yes, Sir, we presented a definite issue—[Ministerial cries of "No!"]—and the right hon. Gentleman in his closing sentences admitted it. He said that the Motion I put on the Paper called in question the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, which was the basis of the Concert of Europe. That is the issue that we have raised and intend to raise. The Leader of the House complained that this Motion was not sufficiently censorious.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: No, I did not.

*Sir W. HARCOURT: Yes, the right hon. Gentleman, I think, is a little bit unreasonable and a little difficult to satisfy. If that Motion had been carried it would have turned out the Government. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial laughter.] What more does he want? If it had been carried it would have put an end to the present Administration. And he says it is not a sufficiently adverse Motion! I have seen it absurdly stated that its terms were "unconstitutional." Why, of course, it would have been unconstitutional if the Government had remained in power, because it would have restrained their hands. But if it had displaced that Government, and put in office a Government in accordance with the principles of the Resolution—[Ministerial laughter]—it would have been perfectly constitutional. Oh, but you say it would not have been carried. Very well, why did you not negative it? Why did you not substitute for it a Vote of Confidence. You might have done that if you pleased. The issue you would not face here or in the country was, whether the forces of the Crown were to be employed against Greece or not. That was the issue we presented to the House. I entirely agree with what my right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean said to-night. I have had the same Parliamentary experience he has had. We entered the House at the same time, and this I will venture to say, as Lord Kimberley said the other day, that in his experience no Government has ever declined to meet such a Motion as that, or shrunk from such an issue when presented to it. In the great contests in which we were engaged—aye, and in which many Members on that Bench were engaged—from 1878 to 1880, Motions far less adverse were brought forward, and the Government of that day, under the lead of Mr. Disraeli, never thought of shrinking from Motions of this kind when brought forward on the responsibility of the Opposition. The Government has declined to meet the Motion. That is their affair. But what it was our business to do was to put on record on the journals of the House the judgment and the opinion of the Gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, representing, as they believe they do, in that respect, the united Liberal Party—[Ministerial laughter and Opposition cheers]—I will venture to say that on this subject the Liberal Party are a good deal more united than the Party opposite, either here or elsewhere. We have put on record, at all events, the principles which we are prepared to maintain. We have complained that we have never succeeded in obtaining from the Government an explanation of the principles upon which they are proceeding. We have had an interesting and able speech from the Under Secretary to-night, but he has never gone into the principles which lie at the root of the matter. He has given us a good deal of interesting detail upon minor matters, but he has never encountered the questions which we have put and which I will repeat to-night, and upon which we have never obtained any kind of answer from the Government. It is true there have been discussions here. Yes, on particular incidents, not on the principles of the policy which the Government are pursuing. There have been explanations in the French and Italian Chambers, and there have been certain spasmodic and fragmentary—what shall I call them?—not discussions or declarations—in the House of Lords. But the right hon. Gentleman says, "Oh, yes. We have explained our principles. We say they are "liberty for Crete and peace for Europe.'" [Ministerial cheers.] Yes, Sir. But what sort of liberty for Crete? I am going to ask that. Is it the liberty for Crete that the Cretan people desire? [Opposition cheers.] That is the question. These vague and general phrases are no explanation of the policy of the Government. What do you mean by liberty for Crete, and how, and with what prospects, are you providing for the peace of Europe? It is not vague phrases of this kind that we want, but something like reasonable explanation of the methods by which you are pursuing the objects at which you profess to aim. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says we have had explanations here. But he does not do himself justice. Really, the explanations we have had from the right hon. Gentleman have not been in the House of Commons. They have been at smoking reunions—[Opposition laughter]—and on platforms in the country. I am going to ask in the House of Commons some questions on these declarations which have not been made here. We have had abusive speeches against Greece delivered at Nottingham by one Cabinet Minister.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): What abuse?

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The other day a Member of the Cabinet said the Greeks were the most intriguing people in the world. [Ministerial cheers.]

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I did not say that. If the right hon. Gentleman quotes me, I hope he will quote me accurately. I said that of all the Eastern Christians the Greeks had developed the least the material prosperity of their country since they had had free government, and that they had a remarkable aptitude for political intrigue and misrepresenting those to whom they were opposed. [Ministerial cheers.]

*SIR W. HARCOURT: We had a question put to the Home Secretary earlier in the evening as to what abusive language was, and if the words the noble Lord has just used represent his idea of complimentary language, we may be left to conjecture what are his conceptions of abuse. We have had what I hope I may, without offence, call a more conciliatory speech from another Member of the Government, at Leeds, with reference to the Greek Kingdom. I complain that speeches of this kind, which profess to give the policy of the Government, are not delivered in the House of Commons. It seems to me it is part of a scheme to disparage the authority of the House of Commons—[Opposition cheers and Ministerial laughter]—to teach the people of this country that the House of Commons is a place of small account, and that it is not a place in which great questions affecting the interests of the nation should be discussed. I regret it, because I am old-fashioned enough still to have respect for the Parliamentary traditions of this country. I regret that the Government have set themselves to work to prevent discussion in this House. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!" and Opposition cheers.] Yes; as no Government before has prevented it, and say:—"We will allow no discussion in this House upon a great question of foreign policy unless you couch it in the form of a Vote of Censure." I say that no such contention has ever been made by any Government in this country before. If we are not to discuss the policy of the Government here, we can discuss it elsewhere. I do not know whether it is extremely politic on the part of a Government with a great majority, and who derive most advantage from the system of Closure in the House of Commons. I should have thought it might have been useful to them here. However, at all events, on a Motion of Adjournment, we have a right of inquiry of the Government which I, for my part, propose to make use of to-night. We have questions to ask the Government as to what they are doing and what they have done. But whenever we ask a question of the Government, they tell us, as the right hon. Gentleman has told us to-night:—"Oh, it is the decision of the Concert of Europe. We do not argue whether it is right or wrong." The right hon. Gentleman says, "In a concert you must have give and take." Yes; but I want to know who are giving and who are taking. As far as I can see, all the giving is on the part of Her Majesty's Government. They tell us:—"The Concert of Europe has decided so and so. We do not tell you it is a thing we approve. We do not profess to defend it." Nobody can deny that is the line they took about the decision in the case of Armenia. But they say:—"The Concert of Europe has settled the matter. We accept it, we submit to it, and execute whatever the Concert has decided." That is a very serious position with reference to the condition of foreign affairs in Europe if all the British Government have to say is, "Whatever the six Powers decide by a majority, that is the policy of the British Government, and that is what the British Government are bound to do." For our part we do not accept that answer. We do not consider that their decision is conclusive, and we claim to investigate what that decision is, and what are the merits of it. We are told that the Concert of Europe is a magnificent conception, that it is a beneficent providence, which is to dispose of the destinies of the world. Well, the right hon. Gentleman has paid me the compliment to quote some observations of mine made last autumn. But they do not correspond to the present position at all. I was arguing at that time against what I considered to be an exceedingly mischievous practice in this House and out of this House of endeavouring to breed bad blood between the different nations of the world. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] That is the language I heard on those Benches about Russia, about Germany, and about France, and that language, I think, is most mischievous. [Opposition cheers.] But that is a very different thing from placing the foreign policy of this country in commission, and stating that, whatever is determined by a certain number of Powers, that England is bound to do. That is the policy against which I enter a protest. ["Hear, hear!"] We have been told that it is a federation of Europe and a legislature. That is an extraordinary and new doctrine. What becomes of the liberty of independent States if there is a federation which has a right to legislate for the world, and for all the States that do not belong to that federation? These are propositions which I absolutely challenge. ["Hear, hear!"] These are what I call the principles of foreign policy as to which we ought to have explanations. Upon this Concert of Europe the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary is perfectly dithyrambic—I do not mean here, but where he has expounded the true policy of Her Majesty's Government on platforms elsewhere. He has told us that the Concert of Europe is a jury which returns a verdict, and he says it is a "Cabinet of nations, and that the destinies of Europe are committed to its collective wisdom and collective responsibility." When he calls the Concert of Europe a Cabinet of nations, I suppose that he has derived the opinion of its sagacity, its unanimity, its decision, its dispatch, and its efficiency from that Cabinet which he represents in this House. This Concert, this Cabinet of the nations, is very much, I suppose, like the Concert of the present Cabinet of Great Britain. But the Cabinet of nations must be judged, like other Cabinets, by its action, and still more by its inaction. Let us see what has been the work of this Cabinet of nations up to this point. We have had some experience of it for the last 18 months. The first question that was committed to its charge and responsibility was the question of Armenia. What has it done with Armenia? In November, 1895, it is quite true that, as the right hon. Gentleman has just said, Lord Salisbury got together this Cabinet of nations, and he told us it had never been so harmonious, and never so determined to put an end to the horrors in Armenia. He assured us it was prepared to act to fulfil those pledges which the "legislature of Europe" had given for the protection of the people of Armenia. That was the assurance Lord Salisbury gave as to the action of the Cabinet of nations. Well, it did not act. [Opposition cheers.] We were told that this Cabinet of nations had determined that Armenia—which all the Powers at Berlin had promised to protect, which the British Government specially in the Cyprus Treaty, had promised to preserve—should be abandoned to its fate. This was the first work of the Concert of Europe. [Opposition cheers.] The reason they gave for this determination was a very remarkable one. They said that if the Turkish Government are not allowed to massacre the Armenians, all the Christian Powers will set to work to massacre one another. That is the actual ground which was alleged, and that is what they call preserving the peace of Europe. [Opposition cheers.] That was the deliberate conclusion of what the right hon. Gentleman calls "the collective wisdom of Europe"—these Powers who say they are such ardent worshippers of peace, who were collected together to preserve peace—and what is their argument in favour of peace? Why that "if you do not do what we propose, we shall make war upon one another." That is really the argument which lies at the bottom of these professions of peace on the part of the Concert of Europe. [Opposition cheers.] The Concert of Europe then came to the conclusion —I hope it was not a unanimous conclusion, and I do not believe it was as regards Her Majesty's Government—that Armenia was to be abandoned to its fate. [Ministerial cries of "No, no!" and Opposition cheers.] Has Armenia not been abandoned to its fate? [Ministerial cries of "No!" and Opposition cheers.] Is there any attempt made to stop those massacres at which Lord Salisbury said the world had turned pale? [An HON. MEMBER ON THE MINISTERIAL SIDE: "You had better ask Lord Rosebery!"] All that took place after the Concert of Europe was established, and while it professed to be in action, and thus we see the cause of humanity and the claims of freedom are sacrificed to the jealousies and selfish interests of the Powers, who declare that they will go to war if they are called upon to listen to those claims of humanity for which they appear to care so little, and to those claims of freedom for which they certainly care a good deal less. [Cheers.] That is the first-fruit of this Concert of Europe, of this Cabinet of nations to whom the destinies of the world have been committed. What is the result? All these Powers have failed to fulfil the pledges which they gave at Berlin, and the British Government, unwillingly I believe, has been obliged to violate the pledge it gave in the Anglo-Turkish Convention. I confess I do not feel disposed to speak disrespectfully of these thrones, dominations, and princedoms. But there are people who have ventured to rush in upon this matter. There is one eminent statesman whom I may venture to quote, because we all know that he knows everything better than everyone else. I need not say I refer to his Grace the Duke of Argyll. [Laughter.] This is what he ventures to say about the Concert of Europe:—

> "That the Powers should have consented even to allow their representatives to spend time in such attempts as these after the experience of half a century of the hopelessly bad faith, and of the cunning procrastination of the Porte, is indeed astonishing. As usual, we seem to have been the leaders in this farce. Our Foreign Office boasted from time to time that we had got all the Powers to act in line, which was indeed true. But what was the line? It was what is called, in the language of military drill, practising the goose step."

[Laughter and cheers.] That is not quite as poetical a description of the Concert of Europe as that given by the Under Secretary, but I venture to think it is, perhaps, a more accurate one. ["Hear, hear!"] Then we are told, "It is quite true that many thousands of Armenians have been massacred, but we have got great reforms in prospect for stopping them in the future." What has become of these reforms?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: They are being carried out.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: For weeks and months the Ambassadors have been discussing them at Constantinople—discussions which remind one of the history of what took place in Constantinople among the Christian Powers before that city fell into the hands of the Turks. The Ambassadors, we have been told, made a plan, and they have referred it to the Powers. Have the Powers accepted that plan? What have they done? Has it been presented? Has it been accepted? No, Sir; the only commentary upon these discussions among the Powers at Constantinople has been the recent massacre at Tokat. That is what the Concert of Europe up to this time has done for Armenia. ["Hear, hear!"] That is its efficiency; that is the ground of the confidence that we are asked to show towards it. ["Hear, hear!"] The next question committed to it was the settlement of the affairs of Crete. How have they settled those affairs? How did they begin? The collective wisdom of the Powers, as the Under Secretary calls it, devised a plan for reforming Crete. That plan proved so ineffective and so absurd that everybody has disavowed it; it has been withdrawn, and it never had any practical existence at all. What was that plan, and what have they been pursuing ever since? It was founded upon that integrity of the Ottoman Empire which was described by Lord Salisbury as backing the wrong horse. ["Hear, hear!"] All they have been doing in Crete has been backing the wrong horse and bombarding the wrong people. [Opposition cheers.] Then, Sir, in the midst of all this purposeless fumbling of the Great Powers came in the intervention of Greece, and the Greeks offered to Crete their liberties in the form in which, as my right hon. Friend has shown, she has always asked for it—in the form of annexation to Greece. [Cheers.] I said that there was a Member of the Cabinet who spoke in very different language of the Greeks from that which was assumed by the Secretary of State for India. This is what the Chief Secretary for Ireland said at Leeds the other day about Greece.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: He is not a Member of the Cabinet.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: There are so many members of the family in the Government that I am sure I may be pardoned for making the mistake. [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear!"] But whether he is in the Cabinet or not, this is what he said:—

> "I do not say that in the first instance the action of Greece in sending troops to Crete was not susceptible of some excuse. It might have been excused in view of the undoubtedly dilatory action of the Powers, and all of us could not help admiring, when we were condemning, the pluck which Greece showed upon that occasion."

[Opposition cheers.] I think that is much more worthy language than that of the Secretary for India, but I cannot excuse the Under Secretary, though he is not in the Cabinet either. The people of Crete, he said, "had always been troubled." They have been troubled, and they have been troublesome, I am happy to say, to some purpose now. They had been violating the law, he said, ever since the time of Minos. Well, we are not acquainted with the laws of

Minos, but if they were at all like the laws of the Sultan of Turkey, the Cretans did quite right to violate them. ["Hear, hear!"] For centuries the Cretans have been the most oppressed people, perhaps, in the world. Let anyone read the accounts of the cruelties and slaughters inflicted on thŏse people in 1866 and 1868. And yet the Under Secretary says, "the majority of the people, who are Christian Greeks, are perpetually warring against the minority, who are Mahomedan Greeks, who have hitherto had the protection of the Mahomedan garrisons." A nice protection to the people of Crete these Mahomedan garrisons! The right hon. Gentleman appears to think it very unreasonable of these troublesome people that they were not satisfied with the protection of these Mahomedan garrisons. Now, as soon as Greece appeared on the scene, then, and then only, the Powers began to bethink them of autonomy. It was Greece that invented for the minds of the Powers of Europe the idea of autonomy, which was not mentioned before. If autonomy is now offered to Crete it is due to the Greeks and to the Greeks alone. ["Hear, hear!"] The Cretans would never have had the offer but for the action of Greece—that proposition is incontrovertible. Now, here is a question I have a right to ask, and I hope the Government will consent to answer it. What is the position which the Powers claim to hold in Crete? That has never been explained by Her Majesty's Government, and I ask the Government to give an explanation. Is it under the authority of the Sultan, exercising by delegation the authority of the Sultan? What evidence is there of that? I know no evidence of it. Did Turkey invite the Powers to go to Crete? That is not the language held, at all events by the Under Secretary, for I find in one of the explanations of his given the other day he says:—

> "We have taken Crete away from the Turk." ["Hear, hear!"] "We have confined his garrison to the coast, and are earnestly hoping to get rid of him altogether—the Turk has accepted his dismissal from Crete."

["Hear, hear!"] Then you invaded a country not your own, you have occupied it, and you claim to dispose of it as you think best for yourselves. You have ousted the authority of the Sovereign. You have not, it is quite true, been invited by the people, but you are going to impose on them a Government they do not desire. Now, what is the position of Greece, and how does it differ from yours? They came adversely, like you, into their position in Crete, and just as you took away Crete from Turkey, Greece has come intending no doubt to take away Crete from Turkey. The only difference I can discover in the international positions is that Greece was invited by the Cretans and you were not. ["Hear, hear!"] Now, I should like an answer to that question. You are both in possession adversely to the Sovereign; but while thĕ one is there with the good will of the majority of the people, the other is in possession contrary to the good will of the people, and trying to impose on them a Government they do not want. ["Hear, hear!"] I should like to have an explanation of the situation from the Government. Why is the position of Greece in Crete a greater violation of international law than your position there? There is another question I should like to ask, for it is a matter we have never had explained. You are blockading Crete, and I should like to ask, whom are you blockading? For what purpose are you blockading Crete? In your declaration of the blockade in the Gazette you speak of the six Powers and "neutrals." We know the six Powers; who are the "neutrals"? Who are the belligerents? Are the Turks neutrals or belligerents? They must be one or the other; which of the two are they? Are the insurgents neutrals or belligerents?

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Belligerents.

*SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member for Sheffield provides an answer, but he is not a Member of a responsible Government at present; he is not conducting the blockade, the Government are. I ask whether the Turks are neutrals or belligerents, whether the insurgents are neutrals or belligerents; and what are the Greeks, neutrals or belligerents? Who, in fact, are the belligerents? Are the insurgents belligerents? Are you then undertaking by force of arms in Crete to put down the Christian insurgents; and are you putting them down by your own authority or by the delegated authority of the Turk? ["Hear, hear!"] The question I should like answered is, Is it your own spontaneous act to put down the insurgents in Crete, or are you acting on behalf of Turkey under the authority of the Sultan? I shall be told, perhaps, that it is to prevent the annexation of Crete to Greece; and I ask, why do you want to prevent the annexation of Crete to Greece? ["Hear, hear!"] I do not ask why the Concert of Powers want to prevent it—I have my own opinion about that—but I ask you why the British Government want to prevent the annexation of Crete to Greece? It is a question, I think, we have a right to ask in the House of Commons, for the whole of the danger to peace at this moment rests on the fact that you are determined that Crete shall not be annexed to Greece. Agree to that annexation and you will have peace to-morrow. I therefore ask you to state why it is you are opposing the annexation of Crete to Greece, which is what the Cretans demand. Is it on principle you are opposed to the annexation, as a thing you think wrong, an evil, a mischief? Not at all. The Under Secretary says this:—"If Crete, after duly considering these great questions"—well, they have considered them for a good many years—"after recovering her equilibrium"—which you are disturbing by opposing annexation to Greece—"were definitely to decide on annexation to Greece, the Powers of Europe, as Lord Salisbury himself has said, will not permanently stand in the way." ["Hear, hear!"] I have no doubt that is your opinion and the opinion of Lord Salisbury; but I ask you now to say, have you authority to say the same for the other Powers, that they will be prepared to allow annexation to Greece, because your saying it alone is nothing so long as the Concert of Europe does not agree in this matter? If it be true that the Concert of Europe is fundamentally radically opposed, not only now but hereafter, to the annexation of Crete to Greece, what is the use of holding out these expectations you have no power to fulfil? This is the root of the whole question. If you and if the Powers did not oppose the annexation you might have peace in 24 hours; therefore, the whole thing turns on the question why you are opposing the annexation. We cannot go back on the old answer that this is the will of the Concert; you must give some reason, some rational explanation, why you are pursuing the course which is the real cause of the present trouble. The Government say, "We offer autonomy to Crete." Yes, and you are blockading Crete at present to compel the great majority of the Cretan people—that is, the Christian population of Crete—to accept autonomy. You say, we will starve and bombard you until you accept autonomy. ["Hear, hear!"] What an extraordinary proceeding this is for a nation like England, professing the opinion that a country should be governed as the people desire, not as other Governments may desire. Why do the people of Crete at this moment resist autonomy? I am not going to tell you in my own words, but in the words used by the Under Secretary in his speech at Southport the other day. He says:—

"I quite understand why and how it is that the Cretan people appear to resist this autonomy. I say appear to resist, because I decline to believe that it is either a genuine or a permanent resistance, but I think they resisted because I doubt if it is fully or adequately explained to them."

Why is it not fully and adequately explained? The reason is that it does not exist at present, that the plan has never been formed. Then he goes on to explain also:—

"As long as the Turkish troops are in the island I can quite understand that the people are reluctant to believe in the reality of the freedom that is offered to them."

That is perfectly true, but you go on bombarding them all the same. [Opposition cheers.] What can be more absolutely irrational than that? ["Hear, hear!"] What is your plan of autonomy? The Under Secretary says, "Oh, there are plenty of plans of autonomy"—ready-made autonomy—[laughter]—as if the Powers had a sort of slop-shop of autonomous Constitutions, and when the time comes they reach down one of them and starve and bombard the people into accepting it. [Laughter and cheers.] That is the sort of autonomy which they offer the Cretan people. The right hon. Gentleman says, and says truly, that they resist because "I do not think it is fully or adequately explained to them." It is only two or three days ago that I read in the newspapers that the Admirals had begged the Consuls to go into the country and explain to the Cretan people the autonomy, and the Consuls very naturally replied, "What autonomy are we to explain?" [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] "We have never heard, and we have never been told, what that autonomy is which is to be explained to them." The right hon. Gentleman says that one of the great difficulties is the presence of the Turkish troops. I ask again, and I say we ought to be told, why are the Turkish troops not removed? Who is opposing it? He says that the English Government have been pressing for it. Yes, we know that they have been pressing, and we give them great credit for pressing it—[cheers]—but the fact is that they are not removed. This shows that the English Government in these matters is a quantité négligeable, and that their pressure is good for nothing. It shows that they are opposed somewhere. Who is opposing in this matter, which the right hon. Gentleman admits is essential to the pacification of Crete, and who prevents the Turkish troops being removed? Then the right hon. Gentleman, as I pointed out just now, said that there was another thing which was of the most capital importance. I do hope we shall have an answer upon this point, because it has been told to us that the peace of Crete, and for aught I know the peace of Europe, depends upon the removal of these Turkish troops. We want to know when it is going to be done, and who is opposing it. Are the Turkish Government opposing it? ["Hear, hear!"] Are the other Powers of Europe opposing it? What is the use of telling us you are giving us an explanation of your policy when this, which is the most critical question of all, is one upon which you can give us no answer. ["Hear, hear!"] We know the thing has not been done. The practical answer is given in the face of Europe that, although the British Government has been pressing for the removal of these Turkish troops, they are still there, and they are the real cause of all the evil which now exists. But there is another thing which the Under Secretary told us with that extra-Parliamentary candour which he indulges in on the platform. He says:—

> "The most important thing is the creation of a supreme governing authority. The present divided jurisdiction in the island—the Admirals in their ships and in the coast ports, the Turkish garrisons in the fortified positions, and the insurgents in the interior—are, and must be, a source of trouble and friction. It is of the highest importance that a supreme governing authority should be appointed, and that, in the absence of a permanent authority, some provisional authority should take its place."

And then he goes on and makes this very important statement:—

> "I am surprised at the suspicions and misconceptions that have surrounded this question. Surely it goes without saying that the Governor of Crete, when he is appointed, will not be a Turk. Of course, he will be a Christian; of course he will be nominated by the Powers."

I ask this question. Have the Powers agreed to that, and have they determined to do it? You have told us it is the most important thing for the restoration of peace in Crete that this Governor should be nominated by the Powers, and I ask you, why has he not been nominated? ["Hear, hear!"] The friction that is going on is a scandal, I may say, to Europe and a reproach to the Concert of the Powers. [Cheers.] You tell us this is a matter of supreme importance and that you are pressing it. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech to-day, told us that it is under discussion; but I saw a day or two ago that Turkey has presented a remonstrance against anything of the kind being done. [Cheers.] Are you going to submit to that remonstrance or are you not? ["Hear, hear!"] You have told us that it goes without saying that there is to be a Christian Governor nominated by the Powers.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Hear, hear.

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, I hope we shall have it in a more definite form that the Powers have accepted it, and that the Porte, whether they choose or not, will be compelled to accept it. [Opposition cheers.] If the right hon. Gentleman says that, categorically it will be satisfactory. We are going on day after day with this state of things which might be removed by this proceeding, and the thing is not done. I will proceed with my catechism. Let me ask this other question. Supposing that you have removed the Turkish troops, which you have not yet done, and supposing you have nominated your Christian Governor, what are you going to do then? You offer autonomy to the Cretans, and they refuse it. Are you going to make war upon them? Are you going to compel them to accept the autonomy whether they choose it or not? It comes from hands which they do not regard as friendly, I am sorry to say. You have so conducted affairs in Crete by joining yourselves in these bombardments—always bombarding the Christians and never bombarding the Turks—that they do not regard you as their friends. They do not desire to accept this autonomy at your hands; they desire annexation to Greece, which you refuse. Then, I want to know, are you going by force of arms to compel them? I see you have sent mountain batteries to Crete. [Opposition cheers.] What are you going to do with these mountain batteries? Are you going into the mountains to fire autonomy out of these cannons into the Christians of Crete? ["Hear, hear!"] The "collective wisdom" must have some plan. When they have accomplished the removal of the Turkish troops, and when they have nominated the Christian Governor, what is the plan of the "collective wisdom?" You are going to make war, if you do make war, upon the Cretans and Greeks. Why? I think we ought to have some explanation, and what is that explanation? It is essential, we are told, to the great doctrine of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. That integrity of the Ottoman Empire is a sacred cause which no profane hands must be allowed to touch. The Concert of Europe are the hierophants who minister to the shrine of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. It is at that shrine that the human sacrifices in Armenia were offered up, and we are told that it is all for the love of peace. In Armenia you made a solitude and you called it peace. [Opposition cheers.] It was in the name of peace that the Powers abandoned Armenia to her fate. [Cheers.] I must say that, when we look at the blood-stained plains of Armenia and the starving Christians in the mountains of Crete, I can hardly describe that collective wisdom as one whose ways are "ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." ["Hear, hear!"] This method of pursuing peace, which has been the result of this collective action, is one which I think will be much more likely to bring war than ever to accomplish peace. If you are to blockade Greece, why are you going to blockade Greece? That again, is in the name of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Who ever stated that? Who ever made that assertion on behalf of the Government?

*SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I thought I had explained what I meant by that. I say that the cause of the whole thing is the resistance to the annexation of Crete to Greece—[Opposition cheers]—and when we ask why you are opposing that annexation we are told we are bound to do it in the interests of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Therefore, the whole thing rests upon the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and upon nothing else. There has been no doubt about that. Lord Salisbury's declarations have been clear and explicit upon that point. We have declared that we will not be a party to a policy founded on the integrity of the Ottoman Empire—[Opposition cheers]—and to that declaration we adhere. I believe that that declaration has the unanimous support of the Liberal Party—["hear, hear!"]—and a great support in the Party opposite also. I do not believe that they are in favour of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Lord Salisbury was greatly offended and greatly shocked because the Earl of Kimberley had declared that we had done with the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and I had the honour of supporting Lord Kimberley in that view. He said it was a momentous statement. I daresay it was a momentous statement, and it was intended to be so. That is our view, at all events, of this matter; but we ask you what is your view of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and in what position England stands in regard to it? This is what I call getting to the root of the question. We want explanations upon that subject, because it is professedly taken as the whole basis of the action in this matter in Crete. We had some explanation on the subject of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire from the Under Secretary of State. He says people are frightened at the bogey of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. First of all, it is a bogey. [Laughter.] Then he says:—

> "Now the integrity of the Ottoman Empire may be viewed as part of the international law. It is an article of the Code of Europe which has been created and consecrated in decrees and treaties by the European Powers, and has been equally modified by them. Europe has created and consecrated that formula."

Therefore, we have got so far. It is a bogey which is a consecrated formula by the European Powers. That makes it quite clear, I think—[laughter]—what is the view of the Government of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. And then the right hon. Gentleman says it is "the most elastic formula which is known," and he indicates that we are to be bound by this elastic formula unless we are released from it by the unanimous assent of the Powers. That is a singular explanation of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire which lies at the basis of your Eastern policy; but I am bound to say Lord Salisbury treats it in a much more serious manner than the Under Secretary. Lord Salisbury does not say it is a bogey at all.

MR. CURZON: I did not say it was a bogey in itself. I said it was made a bogey by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Laughter and cheers.]

*SIR W. HARCOURT: Well, at all events, it was made a bogey, and Lord Salisbury treated it in a much more grim and serious fashion. He says "the integrity of the Ottoman Empire"—and these are very important words—

> "is established by the Legislature of Europe in a law laid down by the only authority competent to create a law for Europe."

I have never heard of any authority that is competent to lay down a law, or of any Legislature in Europe whatever. It is a perfectly new, and in my opinion a most dangerous and mischievous doctrine. I never heard of a limited number of Powers setting themselves up as a Legislature in Europe to enact law. There are such things as alliances, powerful alliances, in Europe which make covenants with one another appropriate to the circumstances of the time. We know what those covenants were in 1856. They have been described as laying money on the wrong horse. [MR. GIBSON BOWLES: "That referred to a proposal made by Russia."] I beg pardon; I say it was the whole policy in 1856, and the principle by which it was inspired is described as "superannuated superstitions, and antiquated diplomacy." That is the basis of "the law of Europe, established by the Legislature of Europe." That, we are told, is the law of the Medes and Persians, which can only be altered by the assent of all the Powers to it. That, as I understand, is the doctrine you take up, and there can be no departure from the principle of the Treaties of 1856, which Lord Salisbury calls the law of Europe, and these are his words:—

> "What is done will be done by the consent of all the Powers by which the integrity of Turkey was made part of European law."

Is that your doctrine? ["Hear, hear!"] Very well, I will put it to the test. Part of that transaction was the tripartite treaty between Great Britain, Austria, and France, and the articles of that treaty are these. Article 1 says:—

> "The high contracting parties guarantee jointly and severally the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire recorded in the Treaty concluded at Paris on March 30, 1856."

No conditions whatever. The second Article is:—

> "Any infraction of the stipulations of the same Treaty will be considered by the Powers signing the present Treaty as a casus belli. They will come to an understanding with the Sublime Porte as to the measures which may become necessary, and will without delay determine amongst themselves as to the employment of their military and naval forces."

Is that the law of Europe? Is it the law even of the three Powers who signed that treaty? And if one of those Powers called upon us to perform the obligations of that treaty, do you mean to say you or any Government in this country would perform them? Why, you know that if the integrity of the Ottoman Empire were invaded, either by insurrection within its own dominions, or by any Power without it, England is not going to make it a casus belli, and the obligation is one which we do not acknowledge. [Opposition cheers.] I venture to say that neither this Government, nor any Government, would ever sit upon that Bench for 24 hours if it held itself bound to go to war under that tripartite treaty. That is a fair and distinct challenge upon the principles laid down by Lord Salisbury. We have a right, then, to ask what is the view of the Government upon the subject of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. We asked where we stood, and Lord Salisbury's definition of it, in my opinion, is a most dangerous one. He said:—"I feel it is our duty to sustain the federated action of Europe." [Cheers.] Yes, whatever it is, and without conditions.

*Admiral FIELD: Hear, hear!

*Sir W. HARCOURT: Ah! but the gallant Admiral, I know, would go into battle at once. [Laughter.] There is no reserve whatever in this matter. Lord Salisbury said "he feels it our duty to sustain the federated action of Europe." He thought that was the duty of the British Government, whether that action was right or wrong. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] We have been told, and told truly, by the Under Secretary that it is not for us alone to determine what that action should be; it is for others, and if the other Powers of Europe are of opinion that certain action should be taken, however impolitic, however unwise, however unjust we may think it, we are bound by the federated action of this Legislature of Europe which is entitled to make the law for Europe. Now, let there be no mistake about it, because this is the language of Lord Salisbury, and I beg the attention of the House to it, as this, as far as I know, is the policy of the Government:—

> "Whatever measures the Concert or federation of Europe may, in its wisdom, think it right to take with respect to the integrity of Turkey, we will be no party to a violation of that integrity without their authority."

[Cheers.] Lord Salisbury talked of momentous words. These are momentous words. These words express the policy of the Government, and in my opinion that is a most dangerous policy. [Opposition cheers.] It is not a policy which the British nation will or ought to support. Conceive what it is. It is not an alliance: it is a submission. Who knows that it will not lead, if the federation of Europe so determine, to the destruction of Greece—Greece, whose freedom is one of the brightest pages in the history of the English people. The freedom of Greece was not secured by the Concert of Europe. I will tell you how it was made. It was made by Mr. Canning refusing to go to the Conference of St. Petersburg, and it was made against the Concert of Europe. You may have the destruction of Greece enacted by this Concert or federation of Europe—if you like in the name of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire—because it suits the convenience or the policy of other countries. I do not desire that we should quarrel with other States, but what I do say is that we cannot assent that the policy of the British nation should be made subordinate and controlled by the decisions of other States. That is a policy to which, in my opinion, this great and free nation will never consent, and it is a policy which we, at least, will meet with a united and determined resistance. [Loud Opposition cheers.]

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY, who was received with loud Ministerial cheers, said: I should hardly have risen to take any part in a Debate which does not seem to me likely to issue in much profit either at home or abroad, had it not been for the challenge thrown out in the first instance by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, and echoed in much more vigorous language by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. They have charged us—the Party which in this House I have the honour to lead—with having adopted in reference to a Motion put upon the Paper last week by the Leader of the Opposition, a course unparalleled in Parliamentary history. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that we are afraid of discussion, that we are even—save the mark!—afraid of a Division—[a laugh]—and that, in order to elude the unpleasant difficulties into which a Vote of Censure might have got us, we have initiated a new precedent in Parliamentary history—one which none of our responsible predecessors would ever have ventured to adopt. Now, let me put that right at once. It is quite true that on previous occasions other ex-Ministers in the position of the right hon. Gentleman have put down Resolutions which did not perhaps in so many words express censure upon the policy of the Government; but, at all events, those Resolutions raised definite issues and were couched in clear and unmistakable language, and the House, after having debated them and divided upon them, presented to the country and to Europe a clear decision upon a clear issue. What was the Resolution which the right hon. Gentleman presented to our notice? These are the words:—

> "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that the forces of the Crown may not be employed against the kingdom of Greece or the people of Crete."

In the face of what has been going on in connection with Greece and Crete, there could not be a more ambiguous Resolution put upon the Paper, and that it was purposely and deliberately ambiguous—[Ministerial cheers]—is evident from the fact that the smallest change of words would have made the issue quite clear and direct, and that change of words, though I pointed out to the right hon. Gentleman how effectively it could be brought about, the right hon. Gentleman deliberately refused to adopt. I will put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, who has occupied an hour and a quarter in catechising me. [Laughter.] He has accused the Government, in concert with the other Powers of Europe, of constantly bombarding the insurgents. Is that or is it not using the forces of the Crown against the people of Crete? [Ministerial cheers.] Is it or is it not? If it is not using the forces of the Crown against the people of Crete, then I do not understand what one-third of the right hon. Gentleman's speech means—[laughter]—for he has perpetually gone on the assumption that we are engaged on behalf of Turkey in using the forces of the Crown against the Cretans. ["Hear, hear!"] If he does not think we are doing that, one-fourth of his speech to-night was absolutely pointless and unmeaning. [Ministerial cheers.] If he takes the other hypothesis, and says the forces of the Crown are at this moment being used against the people of Crete, why could not he draw his Resolution so as to condemn the action which is now going on before his eyes? [Ministerial cheers.] No, Sir, the origin of this precious Resolution, with regard to which the right hon. Gentleman does himself the injustice to suggest that he is the author of it—[laughter]—is plain to the humblest observer of Parliamentary procedure. We all see what must have occurred—what undoubtedly did occur. There are Gentlemen in the united Party which follows the right hon. Gentleman—[laughter]—anxiously desirous that a real Vote of Censure, condemning what the Government are doing and what they have said they are ready to do, should be put to this House and to the country. Those persons—and I daresay there are not a few sitting on the other side—were perfectly within their right in pressing on their Leaders that such a course should be taken, and if their Leaders had taken that course, we, of course, would have followed the universal precedent and have at once said, "Our policy is challenged; it is challenged in clear, definite, and unmistakable language; that challenge we will take up; that battle we will fight; that issue we will decide in the face of the country." [Ministerial cheers.] But these Gentlemen are not the only followers of the right hon. Gentleman. [Laughter.] There are others who take a very different, and I am bound to say I think a more statesmanlike view of the present position of this country; of the difficulties with which this country has to deal; of the responsibilities which rest upon this country; and of the course which it ought to pursue. They look very likely, as they have a right to look, upon the Government in an attitude of critical suspicion. That is a very proper attitude for Members of any Opposition to take up with regard to the Government of the day. But an attitude of critical suspicion does not go the length of condemning either what we have done, are doing, or have said that we are prepared to do; and these Gentlemen, therefore, were not prepared to join in that direct Vote of Censure which their friends below the Gangway would have been delighted to see proposed from the Front Bench. [Laughter.]

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley): There are only six of them. [Loud laughter and cries of "Name!"]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I have no wish to pry too minutely into the secrets of the Party opposite—[laughter]—and it may be that the persons of whom I speak are few in number. It is evident that they are powerful in authority—[cheers and laughter]—and that they make up by their personal weight for the fewness of their numbers. However that may be, it is manifest; and seriously, nobody in or out of the House except Lord Kimberley—[laughter]—who had not been able to find time among his multifarious labours of the House of Lords to discuss these questions in that assembly, and who therefore denounces us for not discussing them here—[laughter]—there is really nobody except Lord Kimberley who is simple enough to believe that the Opposition did mean to put down on the Paper a direct Vote of Censure dealing with the policy of the Government, or who does not see that, as I have already stated, this Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman is not his drawing or is the product of a body which apparently is even more difficult to manage than the Concert of Europe. [Laughter.] But when the right hon. Gentleman accuses us of violating Parliamentary traditions by the course we have adopted, let me tell him that, in my judgment, at all events, the man who made the Norwich speech out of the House—[cheers]—and who proceeds to make the speech to which we have just listened in the House, has a theory of his duty to this House which I have never known any responsible Statesman to have before. [Cheers.]

*SIR W. HARCOURT: I have said every single thing to-night that I said at Norwich. [Cheers and Ministerial laughter.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman, no doubt, has both speeches in his mind with much greater fulness and accuracy than I pretend to have. I am not, perhaps, so persevering a student of the right hon. Gentleman's speeches outside the House as my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Curzon) professes to be, and I may have been mistaken. But such recollection as I have of that speech leads me to believe that, animated no doubt by the audience which he was addressing, the right hon. Gentleman put much more fire into his invective than he has thought it necessary to use in the tranquil and soothing oration which we have heard to-night. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman, at short intervals through his speech, put a series of questions to me which he prefaced by saying, "We have a right to ask the Government" this, that or the other thing. I am far from denying the right hon. Gentleman's right to put as many questions as he likes, but I would ask any man who listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman whether, after listening to that speech, he definitely made out what it is the Opposition complain of in the course we are pursuing. I confess that if I had to frame a Vote of Censure—if the right hon. Gentleman had done me the honour, which apparently he cannot contemplate without horror—[laughter]—of asking me to be his secretary on the occasion and had requested me after hearing that speech to formulate the articles of impeachment which should form the subject of a Vote of Censure—I should have been exceedingly puzzled to do so. [Laughter.] There were a great many hard things said of the Concert of Europe, and of us for joining the Concert of Europe; but I did not make out, although I listened attentively to all the right hon. Gentleman said, whether at this moment he did or did not wish us to make our polite bow to the other Powers and to say, "Gentlemen, we have gone so far; we can go no further; we mean now to revert to the splendid isolation"—which was the object of the right hon. Gentleman's vigorous attacks only 12 months ago. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] There are one or two questions put by the right hon. Gentleman with which I must deal. [Opposition cheers.] He asked one or two questions of international law with which I feel very unequal to the task of dealing. I do not believe that there is any irregularity in the action which the Powers have taken in Crete. Whether our presence there is regarded with pleasure or not by the Porte is a question with which it is not necessary for me to deal. At all events, the Porte has raised no objection to the presence of the European Powers there; on the contrary, they have signified their assent, and I do not believe that we are violating the technicalities—for after all it is a mere technicality—of international law. The right hon. Gentleman asked me some further questions about the blockade, and here I confess I am even more incapable of dealing adequately with the theme raised than I am when he asks us how we justify the presence of the European forces in the island. The right hon. Gentleman is a great authority, an author, a professor, and a writer of letters upon international law, and is far more capable of dealing with this sort of question than I am; and he has the special experience necessary to deal with this question of a pacific blockade—[Ministerial cheers]—as he was one of the Members of the Government which, I believe, first in the history of Europe set the example of a pacific blockade. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] I am quite sure there is no question that could be asked on that point on which he is not capable of enlightening and instructing the House. [Laughter.] Then the right hon. Gentleman asked us when the Turkish troops were going to retire, and he said, "You have stated that your policy is to withdraw the Turkish troops." And so it is—[cheers]—and that policy will undoubtedly be brought to a successful conclusion. But when the right hon. Gentleman says, "Why do not you withdraw them at once?" let me point out that in addition to any other difficulties which might occur to my mind, there is the difficulty which is being brought upon us by his friends the Greeks and the insurgents. ["Hear, hear!"] You have at this moment in the seaport towns of Crete congregated a vast body of Cretan Moslems, driven there from the interior. Europe itself is in occupation of these towns. On the double ground—that it is not our business to be driven out of them by any force, internal or external, and that it is our duty to see that these Mahomedan Cretans are protected from their embittered opponents—we are bound to see that the positions we have occupied are from a military point of view safe from attack. [Ministerial cheers.] I doubt whether at this moment that could be effectually done without, at all events, some assistance from the Ottoman troops. The Ottoman troops have shown themselves, under the guidance of the Powers, perfectly subject to control—I mean the Regulars. As far as I am aware no excess of any kind has been attributed to them by even the most violent and prejudiced of critics. [Ministerial cheers.] We have had to disarm a large number of these Moslem Cretans, who naturally burn with the party animosities which so bitterly divide the island, and who could not be trusted with arms. That operation of disarming has been successfully going on. Not that these men are, so far as I know, in any sense worse than their assailants—["hear, hear!"]—for, mark you, these insurgents whom we are accused of bombarding, themselves fired upon women and children who were taking refuge in boats and whose sole desire was to be taken from the island to a place where they might live in reasonable safety. Although one is very reluctant to say anything which would embitter the present feeling upon this question, though one is very loth, in short, to follow the example so freely set by hon. Gentlemen opposite of using the most violent language in regard to any excesses of the kind which, unhappily, are too apt to occur on such occasions as these—[Ministerial cheers]—let it be noted that the excesses on the part of the Cretan Christians are in some ways as deplorable as anything which can be justly, as far as I know, attributed to their Mahomedan fellow countrymen. The right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to make a series of half-queries, half-criticisms, upon the doctrine that the integrity of the Ottoman Empire ought, in the present position of Europe, to be maintained. And nothing is more characteristic of the unfair methods in political controversy on which the right hon. Gentleman has been forced back in this and in other cases than the use which he has made of the statement of Lord Salisbury and others that the integrity of the Ottoman Empire ought not, in the interests of peace and of mankind for the sake of all the highest interests of the peoples of the East—at this moment to be allowed to be interfered with lightly. The right hon. Gentleman when he speaks from platforms, or when he thinks his speeches will spread through the country, always uses this phrase about maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, as if it meant maintaining all the evils which are but too incident to Ottoman rule in various parts of Asia and Europe. [Ministerial cheers.] No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman that this integrity of the Ottoman Empire carries with it no such consequences. No one knows better that he that the granting of the freest institutions, the most staple Governments, and the best Administrations to this or to the other part of the Ottoman Empire is perfectly consistent with the maintenance of that integrity in the only sense in which that phrase is used by the publicists of whom the right hon. Gentleman spoke. [Ministerial cheers.] Is it not a somewhat discreditable use of rhetorical language—[loud Ministerial cheers]—that the right hon. Gentleman should use the just emotions of horror which the massacres in Asia Minor and the misgovernments elsewhere have raised in the minds of the British people against the Government of the Porte—that he should use that prejudice in favour of the scramble for the fragments of the Ottoman Empire, which, apparently, is the policy the right hon. Gentleman desires to see adopted? [Ministerial cheers.] There is always a danger in the popular use of words which have a technical significance to politicians and diplomatists. But it is the business of those who desire to see the foreign policy of this country conducted upon methods and for objects which, I believe, are dear, not to one side of the House, but to the whole population at large, to take care that these misunderstandings are not aggravated, but are dissipated. It is their business not to use, but rather to sacrifice, such small advantages as may possibly, for the moment, accrue from the raising of unnecessary prejudice, in order to secure the greater objects to which, I am persuaded, even the right hon. Gentleman himself is not in his more careful moments indifferent. [Ministerial cheers.] I do not think it necessary to add anything to what my right hon. Friend has said with regard to recent events, either in Crete or in Greece. But let the House and the country remember that the single central question which we have to decide is this—Has this great country done more for the interests of peace and of freedom by associating itself with the rest of the Powers of Europe than it would have done if it had remained in strict isolation? [Ministerial cheers.] That is the central question; and it is the answer to that question which really contains the final judgment which ought to be passed on the policy of the Government. ["Hear, hear!" from Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and other Members of the Opposition.] I hear the right hon. Gentleman cheer that. Therefore he is clearly of opinion—though he did not state it explicitly in his speech, however much he might have hinted at it—that we ought from the beginning, ever since we have been in office, to have pursued our policy, if we could have so pursued any policy, in isolation and absolutely irrespective of the views and wishes or interests of the other Powers. ["Hear, hear!"] I should like to see him formulate that in a Vote of Censure. [Loud Ministerial cheers.] I will promise him a day. [Renewed Ministerial cheers and laughter.] There are two parts of the world principally with regard to which that question is relevant at the present time. One is Armenia, and the other is Crete; and though Armenia is not now in question the right hon. Gentleman, in his speech, alluded to it too frequently for me to be permitted to pass it by absolutely without reference. The right hon. Gentleman actually went to the length of saying that Europe had made itself particeps criminis in the butcheries which have taken place in certain parts of Asia Minor. [Opposition cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman has himself tried to deal with the Armenian question. He was in power when the worst of all the massacres took place. [Ministerial cheers.]

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): No, not in the autumn of 1895.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The right hon. Gentleman was in power when the worst of the massacres took place; he was unable to deal with them, and neither he nor any responsible statesman has ever yet pointed out how they could have been dealt with by this country in isolation. [Ministerial cheers.] If the right hon. Gentleman in the course of this or of any other of his many speeches had ever suggested how this country, acting alone, acting probably in conflict with some of the greatest Powers in Europe, could have done more than we actually have done to prevent these massacres, he would have made some contribution, as far as Armenia is concerned, to the determination of the question whether we are right or wrong in attempting to act with the European Powers as a whole. But when he tells us we have done nothing for the subject populations in Asia, let me tell him that his information is, in my judgment, wholly inaccurate. [Ministerial cheers.] I believe that we have done, not, indeed, as much as might have been done, certainly not as much as we all must wish could have been done, but something to improve the personnel of administration. And, if the efforts of Europe for reforms in Asia Minor and in Europe have received a check through the recent events in Crete, there is no ground for supposing that those labours are wasted or that they may not in due time bear legitimate fruit. But in any case, whether the reforms of the Turkish Empire, which I believe that Europe will get the Porte to adopt, do or do not succeed in producing a marked amelioration in the condition of the subject populations, this is certain—that if we have failed in concert with the other Powers, then a thousand times more completely and disastrously should we have failed if we had acted without the other Powers. [Ministerial cheers.] So much for Armenia; now as to Crete. The right hon. Gentleman considers that more would have been done for the liberty of Crete if we had refused to act with the other Powers than has actually been done. I am unable to follow the steps of the right hon. Gentleman's argument; I am unable even to conjecture what the steps of his argument are, for he did not condescend to give them in detail. But if I can picture England holding aloof from affairs in the East, and allowing those affairs to be managed wholly by the other Great Powers and by Turkey and Greece, then I am bound to say that, whatever would have been the issue—though we no doubt should not be responsible for it, except by abstention—it would certainly not have been, as far as I can judge, what it now is—namely, the conferring of complete freedom and autonomy upon the island, which has been so long the theatre of these internal difficulties and disturbances. [Ministerial cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman is perpetually haunted by the fear that the promises which we have held out to the House, and the pledges which we have given to the country with regard to the autonomy of Crete are not to be fulfilled in their entirety. I firmly believe that they will be fulfilled, and more than fulfilled. [Ministerial cheers.] I believe that the autonomy on which the Powers of Europe will agree will be at least as full as, and perhaps fuller, than that autonomy sketched by my right hon. Friend in his speech at Southport, and with regard to the fulfilment of which the right hon. Gentleman asked me whether I had any confidence. I have that confidence. Europe has the power, and Europe is absolutely pledged to do it. And, if the present difficulties issue in a form of autonomy less complete and less satisfactory than that which has been found to work so well in other parts of the Turkish Empire, I shall then for the first time begin to doubt whether the right hon. Gentleman had not some justification for the attack which he has made on the Concert of Europe. I frankly say that I am unable to see any evil which has happened to anybody through our joining the Concert of Europe; and I do see the greatest advantages which have accrued both to the cause of freedom and to the cause of peace. [Ministerial cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman openly said that the Powers of Europe, for their own selfish ends, wanted to keep the peace, but cared nothing at all for freedom and good government. I do not know whether it is consistent with the position of the Leader of a great Party to fling these accusations wholesale against Powers friendly to this country—[Ministerial cheers]—Powers with whom he has had to deal in a responsible position, and with whom he may again have to deal in an equally responsible position. [Cries of "No!"] But as far as this country is concerned, at all events, even the right hon. Gentleman admits that our desires are in favour of good government and freedom; and he has produced no fact, nor made any valid suggestion, which would induce anyone to believe that what he admits to be our desires are not going to receive fulfilment. [Ministerial cheers.] When the right hon. Gentleman challenges me upon the right of Europe to prevent the scramble for the Turkish Empire, which he appears to desire, I tell him that in my judgment there is no right—no international right—more obvious and more above criticism. If you are going to give a free hand to Greece, you cannot refuse a free hand to Bulgaria.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Why refuse?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Exactly. You cannot refuse a free hand to Bulgaria. The hon. Gentleman agrees with me, not in the conclusions but in the premisses—a most inconvenient ally of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. [Laughter.] At all events, the hon. Gentleman and I are agreed that if you give a free hand to Greece you must give a like free hand to Bulgaria, to Servia, to Montenegro, to Roumania, if need be; and the hon. Gentleman quite consistently wishes to bring a Vote of Censure against the Government, whose view is, on the contrary, that the destiny of the Turkish Empire should as far as possible remain a question of international agreement, and not be given up to the general arbitration of internecine war. [Ministerial cheers.] Does the right hon. Gentleman opposite agree with us or does he agree with his hon. Friend below the gangway (Mr. Labouchere)? [Ministerial cheers and laughter.] Here you have a choice between two policies, both of them coherent, both of them logical—the policy of the hon. Gentleman and the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The policy of Her Majesty's Government is that the affairs of Turkey are international affairs, that the freedom granted to such portions of Turkey as it can be granted to should be by the united will of Europe, and should be subject to general European control; and that the decay of that Empire, if decay there is to be, should take place. The hon. Gentleman's view, on the other hand, is that the Turkish Empire has got to the point when you have simply got to let loose upon it the dogs of war, to let each Power scramble for what it wants, and let the weakest go to the wall. These are quite clear and inconsistent policies, and there may be something to be said for both of them. But what is there to be said for the policy of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends—[laughter]—who are neither consistent advocates of leaving the whole matter to settle itself as it can, nor consistent advocates of the other policy—more difficult, more strenuous, but surely a more fruitful policy, the one which we advocate—that, namely, of European control? [Ministerial cheers.] None of us on this Bench, certainly not either my right hon. Friend near me or myself, have ever for one moment disguised the difficulties and the dangers which are inherent in the common action of six such different Powers as those which divide Europe. I do not minimise them at the present time; I grant them to the full. But so long as the Powers can be got to work in harmony, and so long as that work is in favour of peace and of freedom, then why in Heaven's name should we be false not merely to the traditions of this country, but to every tradition of honour, of sound policy, and of humanity by refusing to bear our share in that difficult but surely not inglorious task? [Ministerial cheers.]

MR. F. S. STEVENSON said that those who had taken a deep interest in Eastern affairs had never understood the Concert of Europe in the sense now laid down. They had always understood by it the action of those Powers which were chiefly interested in the affairs of the Ottoman Empire. He was afraid the right hon. Gentleman in his references to events in the Armenian provinces had not taken the trouble to refresh his memory. As a matter of fact, the massacre at Sasun was by no means the greatest of the massacres; the greatest massacres took place in October, November, and December of 1895, and also January, 1896. That was since the present Government came into office. He only mentioned that point because the right hon. Gentleman appeared to think the greatest massacres occurred in 1894, which was not the case. With regard to what the Concert was doing in Asia Minor, the House had no information whatever, and there was no ground, so far as our present knowledege was concerned, why possible action on the part of the Concert in Asia Minor should be adduced as a reason for acting in accord with the other Powers in regard to Crete. The right hon. Gentleman said the Government had no knowledge of any negotiations between Turkey and Greece. It was a curious thing that what was matter of common knowledge should not have reached the responsible Ministers of this country. If the right hon. Gentleman would address a simple inquiry on that point to our Ambassador at Constantinople he would be able to obtain information which would have a useful bearing on the present situation with regard to negotiations between Turkey and Greece, which were stopped by the action of one or other of the Great Powers. With regard to Crete, if the Powers were in earnest, all they had to do was to insist on the trans-shipment of the Turkish troops away from Crete, and at the same time to put before the people of Crete, in clear and unmistakable language, that the autonomy was to be a real and not unsubstantial autonomy, including the right to choose their own ruler and their own form of rule. If the Government would do that, and induce some of the other Powers to take the same view, they would find not only the situation in regard to Crete had been enormously simplified, but also that the chances of European peace had been vastly augmented, and that the difficulties which now loomed on the northern horizon would for the time sink into the background. It could not be contended that Germany, for example, a Great Power numerically, had the same interests in the Balkan Peninsula as Greece, or Bulgaria, or Servia, or even little Montenegro. Every one of these Powers had more right to be consulted than Germany, and yet in this matter the Great Powers professed to have the exclusive right to settle the question. The Hellenic race outside numbered three times the population of that in the kingdom of Greece, and it had a stronger right to be heard than any of the Great Powers. Bulgaria, Servia, and Montenegro had also a right to be heard and consulted. The Great Powers professed to have the East in their hands for disposal, but he protested against the exclusion from the councils of the Concert of the smaller and rising nationalities of the East.

*Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester) said it was right that Conservatives and Liberal Unionists should express their criticisms with regard to this question as freely as hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had seen no cause to change the opinion he formed many years ago that the protecting Powers made a grave mistake in not allowing the annexation of Crete to Greece in 1830; yet they could not shut their eyes to the fact that the Great Powers had now unanimously come to a decision that in no circumstances at present would they allow the annexation of Crete to Greece. It was clear that Greece singlehanded could not contend against the will of the Powers. If, however, the Powers had insisted on a simultaneous evacuation of Crete by the Turks and the Greeks, there would have been no probability of war. He believed that Greece was willing to assent to that, provided that the ruler should be selected by the inhabitants of Crete. What struck him most was the unreality of the situation. The Great Powers had offered autonomy to Crete, but Crete had never asked for it, while numerous revolutions had taken place in favour of annexation. They were constantly being reminded that the Treaty of Paris ought to be observed, whereby the Powers had pledged themselves to maintain the integrity and the independence of the Ottoman Empire. But that Treaty was torn to shreds many years ago by Russia when she expressed her intention of no longer being bound by the condition which confined her fleet to the Black Sea. Did France and Great Britain pay much attention to that Treaty when they established the dual control in Egypt, and removed Ismail Pasha from the Khedivial Throne? Was Lord Beaconfield deterred by the Treaty of Paris from bringing Cyprus from the Congress of Berlin in his pocket? Province after province had been torn from Turkey; some of them had been created principalities, with a sort of shadowy suzerainty left to the Porte, while some had been annexed to existing kingdoms. He had heard with pain and regret the endeavour made to humiliate Greece by throwing in her teeth her poverty and inability to pay full interest on the national debt. What was the cause of this? When the Hellenic Kingdom was established, its borders were curtailed to such an extent that the newly-established kingdom was utterly unable to maintain her proper state and find funds necessary for the position of a European kingdom. Since 1821 no fewer than eight insurrections had occurred in Crete, and on each occasion thousands of refugees had been sent to Greece. Thus Greece was made poor by having to maintain these refugees, and it was scarcely generous of English Members to reproach her with a poverty for which she was not responsible. He thought that if the British Government had left the Concert of Europe, it would have given a freer hand to some of the other Powers to coerce Greece. He believed that the presence of our Ambassador at Constantinople had an excellent effect in preventing certain outrageous proposals from being adopted on the part of one or more of the other Powers. He was sure that autonomy to Crete would eventually prove a failure. Autonomy might endure for a while, but annexation would come in the end, and with it would come rest and peace and prosperity to the fairest island in the Ægean over which the upas tree of Turkish misrule had long cast its deadly shade.

MR. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport) said that there were two circumstances which gave this Debate special importance. One was that they were on the eve of a longer Easter recess than usual, and that during that recess hon. Members would have no opportunity of hearing from the Government what their policy was, or of checking it. The other circumstance was that the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary were one and the same person. When these positions were for the first time fillled by the same person, Mr. Gladstone moved an Amendment to the Address objecting to the arrangement. Now Lord Salisbury was practically an autocrat in regard to foreign affairs, which added considerable danger to the situation. Lord Salisbury was a politician with a past, and that past was not such as to inspire great confidence in his conduct of foreign affairs. Had hon. Members observed how extraordinary a similarity there was between the progress of events in the last six months, and the progress of events in the same period 20 years ago? In June 1876 they learned for the first time through the Press of the Bulgarian atrocities, and there was at once a spontaneous uprising in the country. Attention was drawn to the subject by the Marquess of Bath, a Tory in the House of Lords, and by Mr. Forsyth, a Tory also, in the House of Commons. By September 1876, the whole Liberal Party, with that third of the electorate which was neither Conservative nor Liberal, were united as one man under the leadership of that Minister who had been well described by a foreign Statesman as "The Minister of Pity." Suddenly, the force of the agitation that threatened to sweep the Government from office was dissipated, because certain prominent leaders of the Liberal Party refused to follow Mr. Gladstone's lead any longer. The result was that the rein was given to the Jingo anti-climax, and that state of things continued until Lord Beaconsfied brought back his so-called "peace with honour" from Berlin. But from June 1876 to April 1878 there was one Minister in the Cabinet who was regarded by friends and foes alike as the one Member of the Government who was for the Christians as against the Turks. That Minister was Lord Salisbury. But when, in 1878, the Foreign Secretaryship and the reversion of the Premiership were offered to him, in spite of all that he had said during the preceding 21 months, he renounced what the people had been led to believe were his convictions, and became a party to the threat of war against Russia, and to a policy of which he, of all men, probably much disapproved. Therefore, he thought it dangerous that they should rise for the recess, during which the conduct of the foreign policy of this country would be wholly in the hands of Lord Salisbury, without knowing what the Government were going to do next. They had the experience of the past to warn them. On April 16, 1878, Parliament rose, and there was a Debate like the present, information being anxiously sought as to the intentions of the Government, for we seemed to be on the verge of war with Russia. Sir Stafford Northcote declared that the House might rely upon it that no new move was in contemplation; but two days afterwards they read in the papers of the proposed employment of the Indian troops. Precedents of that kind were not encouraging, and they were naturally anxious for more information than had yet been given them. He wanted to know what were the forces of which the Government were afraid inside the Concert? They were told that the Government were honestly anxious to give autonomy to Crete, that there was to be a Christian governor, and that the Turkish troops were to be withdrawn. Then why were these things not done? It was clear that within the Concert there were forces hostile to the Eastern Christians. The policy of the Government and the action of the Concert had not availed to save one single Armenian life, or to secure Armenian women from outrage. Why could not the Government imitate the example of Canning? They always spoke as if they must either remain muzzled inside the Concert or leave it. But there was a third course. There was the course taken by Canning—namely, that of remaining in the Concert for the purpose of smashing it. The three Great Naval Powers might then be able to come to an agreement for the settlement of the questions affecting Crete. As it was, our Fleet had shelled the Christians in the island, but had not fired a gun against the Turk; no effort had been made to remove the Turkish troops, and no pressure had been brought to bear upon the Turks in the island. The Government doubtless thought that with their majority they could be independent. They would do well, however, not to be over-confident, for the people were moved by this Cretan question to an extent not exceeded in the last 20 years. The people cared nothing for the Concert of Europe, and there was amongst them a feeling of intense indignation at the nation that in any circumstances whatever a British ship should fire against either Cretans or Greeks. He believed the Government was strong enough to smash up the Concert of Europe and make another combination which would tell for freedom and justice. Meanwhile they were left without information, England being dragged at the tail of this Concert because the Government had not the pluck to resist it. This was the most degrading position which the country had been placed in for many years, and he believed it would bring a just retribution on the Government when the first opportunity occurred.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

*ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) said the hon. Member for Devonport had taunted the Government with not having saved a single life in Armenia at the time when the Concert of Europe was being maintained, but he had also committed himself to the statement that England was first of all a Naval Power. What then did the hon. Member think that this country ought to have done? The whole argument of the hon. Member was not worthy of consideration. Moreover, his remarks were offensive as well as inconclusive. The hon. Member also said that they were either misled, or else that England remained in the Concert of Europe in order to smash it. The latter suggestion was an imputation of dishonourable conduct, which it was unnecessary to refute. The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean had made the strange statement that the Liberal Party was unanimous on this question. They had not seen many signs of this unanimity, at all events. The right hon. Member had also said, with a remarkable amount of assurance, that hon. Gentlemen opposite represented the opinion of the country. He took exception to any such statement. In that House the concentrated essence of the opinion of the country was represented, and he took exception to a Member of a Party which was in a very considerable minority claiming to represent the feeling of the country. That Parliament was young and vigorous, and had a long life before it. He had studied this question from a naval point of view. The Navy had a great deal to do with this question in 1829. He had always thought that a terrible mistake had been made at that time, and the Admirals on the spot after the battle of Navarino all strongly urged that Crete should be united to Greece. It was, however, useless to find fault with past history. No doubt the statesmen of that day realised that it was necessary, in order to preserve the balance of power in Europe, to keep the Ottoman Empire as strong as possible. Of late public opinion had changed with regard to Turkey. No one now would lift a finger to save the Ottoman Empire if he had the power. He trusted that no more mistakes would be made. He knew from communications he received from Crete that the naval officers there did not like the business they were engaged in. [Opposition cheers.] But they were the servants of their country, and wished to do their duty. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean spoke of England as the slave of the Concert of Europe, and advised that we should cut ourselves adrift from it.

*Sir C. DILKE: With other Powers who, I suggested, might be willing to follow us.

*Admiral FIELD said he could well believe that France was in sympathy with England, but she was fettered by another Power, and as long as this was so, was it reasonable to expect that she would follow us? If England retired from the Concert of Europe, the Cretans, whose liberty and freedom the Party opposite said they desired, would lose their best friend among the Powers of Europe. If England cut herself adrift from the rest of Europe she would have no voice in the settlement of the Cretan difficulty but by going to war. Looking at the matter all round, he was certainly of opinion, much as he disliked the present situation, that it would be a disastrous stroke of policy for England to retire from the Concert of Europe. We ought to reflect what advantages had accrued to the Cretans by the presence of England in the Concert of Europe. The blockade of Crete last autumn was prevented because England refused to be a party to it, and to play the part of policeman for Turkey. If England withdrew from the Concert of Europe her withdrawal would be final. She could not re-enter, and she would have no voice in the consultation from which she had withdrawn unless she asserted her power by force. Mr. Gladstone, speaking at Edinburgh on November 25, 1879, in denunciation of the policy of Lord Beaconsfield in sending the British fleet to the Dardanelles when the Russians were outside Constantinople, and so preventing the Treaty of San Stefano from being brought into operation, said:—

> "We always protested against single-handed attempts to coerce Turkey. We felt that single-handed attempts to coerce Turkey would tend to immoderate bloodshed and calamity and with uncertainty as to the issue. The coercion we recommended was by the united authority of Europe, and in a case where the united authority of Europe was brought into action there was no fear of having to proceed to active coercion."

He respectfully commended this to the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. Member for Northampton. Could it be said that what was considered sound policy by the Liberal Leader then was not sound policy now? Turkey was now weak, and a more potent source of mischief than in days when she was strong, and he considered Mr. Gladstone's argument had greater force now. The Leader of the Opposition objected to the Concert of Europe committing us to any policy it chose, and said there were limits beyond which England ought not to go.

Sir W. HARCOURT: I quoted Lord Salisbury, who said that.

*Admiral FIELD said he thought the right hon. Gentleman gave it as his own opinion. As he had said, naval men hated this business. Their firing on the insurgents had been spoken of as if they did it of their own free will. The officers who ordered the guns to be fired would regret the necessity, but it was done to prevent the insurgents from occupying positions which dominated the town and anchorage. Warnings had been sent to the insurgents which they never received. That was not the fault of the naval officers. No doubt they fired wide. There was no real Concert of Europe until Lord Salisbury met the Czar of Russia at Balmoral in October last, and by his Dispatch of October 21, 1896, brought the Powers into line, Russia consenting to force being used if the reforms undertaken by Turkey were not carried out. The Concert of Europe existed nominally before, but there was no real Concert of Europe until that date. As long as the Concert of Europe existed it made for peace. He was quite sure that if the Leader of the Opposition were in office he would not care to see England withdrawing from the Concert of Europe and having no voice in the settlement of the Cretan difficulty except by the use of force. He studied with great interest as soon as it appeared the work of "Historicus" on "International Law." He always understood that international law was founded on the Concert of Europe. This Concert of Europe might arrive at a certain decision, and whatever that decision was, it would be entitled to more respect than the right hon. Gentleman (who was the author of those famous letters, signed "Historicus") had given it that night. The right hon. Gentleman had asked what they meant by a blockade. He was with him there, for he was sure he did not know what it was. He looked upon it as the exercise of a certain amount of necessary force to prevent supplies reaching the Greek troops. None of them wished to stop the supply of necessaries reaching the insurgents, and he hoped a blind eye might be turned to any vessel engaged in this latter work. What he presumed was intended was to hinder supplies reaching the Greek troops who had no business to be on the island. Why did the right hon. Gentleman say they were bombarding the Christians? They did not wish to starve them, or to hurt a hair of their heads, and all they were trying to do was to prevent them planting guns in a position which would enable them to fire on the passive inhabitants of these towns. Again, the right hon. Gentleman asked why were the Turkish troops not withdrawn? He wished they were, for he believed there would be no peace in the island until they were. The Admirals had recommended the withdrawal of the Turkish troops, and it was not the fault of this country that they had not been withdrawn. Where they had six leading men, representing six leading countries, none of whom could come to a decision upon what action could be taken without reference to the Government of his particular country, there must necessarily be delay. He knew that everybody on his side of the House wished to see all the Turkish troops out of the island, and for the sake of legality he wished to see the Greek troops also out of the island. He stood not on the order of their going, but he wished them to go at once. He did not, however, see how the matter could be forwarded by discussions such as had taken place that night, and which, instead of serving any useful purpose, could only tend to embarrass the Government in dealing with a question of great difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman had made light of the words, "integrity of the Ottoman Empire." He presumed the right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that not a man in England would lift up his little finger to maintain the Ottoman Empire. He supposed it was a figure of speech, and to please other Powers, that they had to support the policy of autonomy for Crete when they should all prefer that the Cretans should have direct annexation to Greece. But they could not always get what they wanted at once; they must take it by instalments, and Crete had already been assured that if she would be patient and accept the benefits of the rule offered to her of autonomy, the annexation she desired would come in due course. He urged that the Government in their action in this matter, instead of deserving any censure, merited the support of the House and of the country.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) remarked that the hon. Member had asked why a little more patience on the part of the Cretans could not be shown in the Great Powers of Europe? Anybody who had followed the history and fortunes of this unhappy people, even for one year, could have no difficulty in answering that question. The Cretans, in August of last year, were promised certain reforms by the representatives of the Great Powers, and, trusting to these promises, they laid down their arms. Fortunately they did not part with them altogether. What was the consequence? Within two or three months of those promises being given, the Cretans were handed over to pillage, murder and massacre. On the 5th of February last, under the very guns of the ships of the Great Powers which were lying in the port, all the Christian quarters of Canea were delivered over to flames, and rapine was let loose in the streets. It was mockery for the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs or the First Lord of the Treasury to stand up at this time of day and say that the people of Crete ought to trust to the pledges given them on behalf of the foreign Powers, and ought to wait patiently for those reforms and this autonomy that were promised them. They were told that autonomy was certain. But what was meant by autonomy no man outside the sacred circle of the Foreign Office understood. The Under Secretary, speaking to his constituents on Saturday, declared that autonomy (which he denounced the Irish Members for opposing) was synonymous with Home Rule. Did the right hon. Gentleman really mean that it was a similar measure of reform to the Home Rule Bill for Ireland? If he did, then he had to tell him that that autonomy would be utterly valueless to protect the liberty of Crete. Home Rule for Ireland left the forces of the Crown under the control of the Central Executive in this country, and left the troops of Her Majesty in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the whole matter was settled when he declared that the autonomy offered to Crete was the same as that offered to Ireland. If the First Lord or the Under Secretary knew themselves, they let nobody else know what this autonomy, which was in a state of nubibus, was supposed to be. When the First Lord of the Treasury and the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs declared that the liberty of Crete was secured, he would refer those right hon. Gentleman to what the Consuls and Admirals on the spot had said, and he quoted an extract from The Times' correspondent at Canea, dated 8th of the present month:—

> "In a conference this morning at Suda the Admirals informed the Consuls that their Governments had considered that it might be advisable to explain clearly to the insurgents that the blockade was directed against the Greek troops, and also that autonomy was to be granted to the island. The Admirals stated that they had informed their Governments that they considered such a measure useless. The Consuls concur in this opinion, and express the conviction that, unless something more definite than a mere proclamation of autonomy can be made by them, no result can be expected of a mission to the insurgents by the Consular body."

So, out of the mouths of their own Consuls the Powers were condemned. After six weeks of muddling and absurd statements and answers, here was the joint wisdom of the Admirals and Consuls on the spot, declaring that unless some particulars were given of the terms of autonomy it would be no use the Consuls going among the insurgents or making any proclamation at all. In the very same letter there was a most characteristic paragraph:—

> "Since yesterday there has been sharp firing round Candia, which was continued to-day, the Turkish troops all sallying out, and the patrolling of the town being done by the European troops."

And it was added the Seaforth Highlanders had been landed. In spite, then, of the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman, no longer ago than the 8th of the present month the Turks required the Seaforth Highlanders to maintain order in the town while they went out upon one of their usual sallies. And all the time there was no authoritative, no specific or definite declaration before the insurgents of the scheme of autonomy which the Consuls would not take on themselves the responsibility of fathering. He maintained, and he insisted, that up to this hour the insurgents had not one shred of justification or ground for hope that if they laid down their arms they might place reliance on the action of the Powers. They were left to their own resources and their arms alone. When he heard men talk of the unreason and the want of patience displayed by the insurgents he felt how cruel it was to use such arguments against a race who for centuries had suffered persecution, tyranny and oppression beyond any other people in Europe. Disorderly and troublesome they had been, incurring the sneers and contemptuous allusions of the right hon. Gentleman the other day at Southport, but they had reason to be proud of their conduct. They had not been butchered like the Armenians; they had manfully faced their oppressors, and had struck back blow for blow; they were entitled to the sympathy of Europe. They had some excuse for their impatience; they had good reason to be suspicious. They had rebelled over and over again; they had fought for, and had now, their liberty again and again, but had been thrust back again under the feet of their oppressors. The gallant Admiral opposite had referred to the hatred of naval men of the job upon which they were engaged; he had the acquaintance of many naval men, and had not the slightest doubt that this was their feeling. This country had the particular duty to redress the grievances of the Cretans, for it was this country, against the views of France and Russia, after the gallant struggle from 1827 to 1830, thrust back the people under the heel of Turkey. The Cretans, after another noble struggle, appealed to the Powers at the Berlin Conference; they were listened to; they were promised reforms; they trusted to the faith of Europe, but that faith was basely broken; they were pushed back under the control of their enemies, and deeds of infamous cruelty were perpetrated such as could hardly be spoken of in the House. They had risen and fought again and again for their liberties, and last autumn the Powers of Europe again offered them a Constitution. There was no more touching incident in connection with this struggle than the way in which the Cretan leaders expressed their thanks to the Powers of Europe for the Constitution, expressing the confident hope that the Powers would superintend the carrying out of those reforms in such a way as would put a period to the sufferings of their country. But the Powers of Europe betrayed them again; they were again handed over to the cruelty and treachery of the Turks. To anyone who had followed the course of events, it must create a feeling of disgust to hear the First Lord of the Treasury say that the attitude of the Porte towards these people had been perfectly correct. What was that attitude? When the Constitution of last year was given to the Cretan people they did not like that Constitution; they desired, as they had always desired, to be united to Greece; but at the desire of the Powers and entreaties by the Greek Government, anxious to avoid the situation into which they had now been driven, they accepted that Constitution in good faith. And what was the conduct of the Porte? The Porte was bound to appoint a Christian Governor, and did so. But they forthwith sent a military Governor of higher authority, who overruled and set at naught the authority of the Christian Governor, and secret instructions were sent to the Turkish troops and Moslems in the island to take sufficient measures and proper means, in plain English, by murder and by the looting of Christian houses, to create disorder and secure that the new Constitution should not succeed. It was clearly and unmistakably the duty of the Powers of Europe, if they did not mean to break their plighted faith, to have forthwith and immediately taken measures by force to see the Constitution of August last loyally carried out by the Porte. What did they do? They sent ships to Crete. Were they for the protection of the Cretan people? No, they were not; and the Dispatches showed they were not. The ships were sent to Crete, not for the protection of the Christians of Crete, but for the protection of the British subjects there; and all along, month after month, there were instructions sent to the Admirals, and correspondence with the captains clearly showed that fugitive Christians were not to be allowed on board, and actually in the Dispatches descriptions were given of the precautions taken by captains, in case of riot and slaughter, to prevent Greek Christians taking refuge on the ships, and to reserve the protection of the ships for British subjects alone. The ships were in Cretan waters, not to secure the carrying out of reforms, but to protect British subjects and property when it became apparent that disorder would break out. So far as he could understand, the first step to protect Christians was taken on the initiative of the French Government, who gave orders to extend protection to all Christians and not to French subjects only, and then the British Government followed suit.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: No; it was the other way about.

MR. DILLON said he must join issue with the hon. Member. He had read the Blue-book carefully.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: So have I.

MR. DILLON said they laboured under one great difficulty in having an Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs who must frequently regret that he was born in a constitutional country. There was an extraordinary statement in his speech the other day at Southport. He declared that the Opposition in the House spent about two hours every night—

MR. CURZON: No; I did not say that. I said spent about half-an-hour each night. And most of the time was occupied by the hon. Member. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. DILLON said he had a perfect right to spend half-an-hour on the subject; he would spent three hours if he thought he could be the means of saving one life among this Christian population. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman said at Southport the Opposition spent half-an-hour every night in trying to "score off him." The right hon. Gentleman was somewhat oppressed by the importance of his position. No one of the Opposition ever dreamed of scoring off him; it was never within the wildest dreams of their ambition; they did not dream of scoring off a Member of the Government of such abnormal intelligence and acuteness; they simply endeavoured to obtain such information as the British House of Commons was entitled to have. It appeared to some of the Opposition that the right hon. Gentleman, with the present Ministry, had turned attention so much to the proceedings of the Concert of Europe that they had come to regard the method of conducting affairs in Russia and Germany as far preferable to that which was followed in the House. No doubt it was more convenient for Ministers; but the right hon. Gentleman had been born in a constitutional country, with a free Parliament, in which he had a seat which, judging from his former action, he was extremely desirous of retaining, notwithstanding the criticisms to which he was there subject, and could not wish to move to a more distinguished place. All the Opposition had tried to do was to elicit such information as the House of Commons was entitled to possess. If the questions were numerous, and he was hard pressed, it was because the curt answers of the right hon. Gentleman gave very little information. The right hon. Gentleman was pleased to be extremely hard on Irish Members; he spoke of them as a faction always in sympathy with insurgents in all parts of the world, and he supposed that was because they had so often been insurgents themselves. That was probably intended to be a cruelly crushing blow to the Irish people, but he, as an Irish Member, accepted the words in a totally different sense. He dared say it was quite true that they naturally sympathised with insurgents because they had so often been insurgents themselves, and he was not at all certain that that was a thing to be ashamed of. If the Irish Members were open to the charge and suspicion of being too sympathetic with insurgents, he thought they were entitled to retort that the worst people in the world who could be placed in unrestrained control of insurgents were Admirals. [Laughter.] If the first instinct of the Irishman was to rebel, the first instinct of an Admiral was to maintain discipline without any regard to the merits of the case. [Laughter.] There was a special reason why he and the Irish Party with whom he acted took an interest in the fight of the Cretan and Greek peoples. The voices of O'Connell and Grattan were raised 60 years ago in that Parliament to claim that Crete should have her rights, and be set free from the tyranny of Turkey, while the name of a great and gallant Irishman had been identified with the War of Independence—one who, he supposed, contributed most to the vindication of the liberty of Greece, and, after all, the liberty of Crete was at one with the liberty of Greece. When one read the inscription over the tomb of Richard Church at Athens, "that he gave himself and all he had to rescue a Christian race from oppression and to make Greece a nation," he thought that was another bond which bound the Irish National Party to the cause of Greece. They were told that Greece and Crete and that the House of Commons must trust absolutely to the Concert of Europe, and the First Lord of the Treasury endeavoured to make out that this country was tied by the alternative of either withdrawing from the Concert of Europe or of submitting absolutely, without any limit whatever, to whatever the Concert decided. He utterly denied that any such alternative was placed before this country. The Concert of Europe might be, and he dared say sometimes was, a very excellent thing, but it had been, and they saw it might be, the most malignant and hateful enemy of liberty, and it would be an evil day for liberty if the doctrine were to be laid down, as it had been laid down frequently during these later days, that for the future this country and every great State in Europe was to be bound absolutely to the Concert to do what they willed and to abstain from doing what they forbade. The fault most of them had to find with the present Concert was that they did nothing, and that what little they did seemed to make for mischief. [Ministerial laughter.] Here was a passage which struck him as being most characteristic and most significant of the estimation in which the Concert of Europe was at present held, from the Constantinople correspondent of The Standard on the 3rd of this month:—

> "The alarm inspired at the Yildiz Kiosk at the possibility of a break-up of the Concert of Europe is on the increase, and, in view of the present situation, a most important special Commission, consisting of six members—four Turks, one Armenian and one Greek—has been sent to Tokat to hang off-hand all whom the members are unanimous in finding guilty."

That was an extremely significant fact, because, as far as he could see, the Sultan of Turkey was the only man who had displayed any great alarm or fear that the Concert of Europe might break up, or who seeemed to be disposed to place any very extreme value on that Concert. As to the present condition of

Crete, they had been hearing from the Under Secretary for weeks, he might say for months past, optimistic statements in the House that the condition of affairs was rapidly progressing from good to better. In spite of these repeated statements, the condition of things had steadily gone from bad to worse. A very remarkable letter appeared in yesterday's Observer from an English gentlman who had just returned from the interior of Crete. Speaking of the proceedings of the Powers there, he said:—

> "They allow the Turkish troops, the Bashi-Bazouks, and the men-of-war, to attack the Christians, and burn houses and churches, but they immediately bombard the Christians when they fight against the Turks even in self-defence. The consequence is, that they are rapidly reducing the island to a state of anarchy. What else could be expected from intrusting the management of negotiations which require skill, tact and patience to half-a-dozen peppery sailors, whose only idea of diplomacy is a proclamation of an amorphous autonomy, tempered by spasmodic bombardments?"

It was a mockery and an absurdity for Members of the Government to stand up, day after day, and declare that their one object is freedom in Crete and peace in Europe, when all their proceedings had a manifest tendency to create anarchy in Crete and war in Europe. With regard to the blockade, if it was true, as was stated on excellent authority, that the supplies of food were running short, and that it was peaceable inhabitants who were suffering most, he wanted to know on what grounds the Government could defend such conduct? According to Mr. Thomas Sandwith, who was for many years the British Consul in Crete,

> "in 1878, when the interior of Crete was altogether in the hands of the insurgents, the peaceful Christian peasantry were allowed free access to the garrison towns in order to purchase provisions,"

because the Turkish Vali

> "strongly condemned the policy of starving women and children, and the Porte acquiesced in his view."

Yet the Concert of Europe was now engaged in what the Turkish Vali refused to do in 1878. The answer which the Under Secretary of State gave on the 7th of April to his question as to whether the Admirals had made any arrangement to allow provisions to reach the inhabitants of Crete was most insulting and cruel. According to the Crete correspondent of The Observer, while the Admirals would not allow food to be sent to the Christian troops or into the interior, they allowed food to be freely landed for the Turkish soldiers, and in some of the villages the Christians were already reduced to such straits that they were feeding on the roots of wild plants. Was that a decent condition of things to prevail through the operation of the British ships and the blockade carried out by the Christian Powers of Europe? In Candia, Retimo, and in other towns around the coast, the Turkish troops and irregulars were going out and pillaging Christian villages, knowing that when the Christian insurgents pressed them too hard they could retire under the protection of the troops of the Powers. It was idle for the Government to say they were operating in Crete in favour of the liberty of the people and were not taking a side. They were taking the side of the Turkish troops, and endeavouring to bring the insurgents to surrender. At present no sympathiser with the insurgents could ask them to lay down their arms. The insurgents would be fools to lay down their arms; indeed, what they had now to trust in were their rifles and the support of the Greek troops. In his opinion it was the duty of every man who had sympathy with a struggling people, and who valued liberty, to protest on every available occasion against the attempted starvation of the insurgents, and against the blockade and bombardment of Crete.

Mr. T. W. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton) said that of the hon. Member for East Mayo it might be truly said that, if he was not necessarily in favour of insurgents all over the world, by some curious chance he always happened to find himself in sympathy with people who were fighting against this country—[Hon. Members: "This country," and Opposition cheers]—in favour of people whom he erroneously imagined to be enemies of this country. [Mr. Dillon: "Are the Cretans and Greeks enemies of this country?"] It was not long since the Mahdi was highly popular with the hon. Gentleman and his political associates, and it was, therefore, only natural that Colonel Vassos and his men should have inherited some little popularity. The hon. Member had frequently charged the Government with taking the side of the Turk. The hon. Gentleman was not a humorous or frivolous person; if he were one would be inclined to suppose that the charge was made in jest, for really a more preposterous statement it was impossible to imagine. If the Government had erred at all it seemed to him they had erred in showing partiality towards the Greeks. They rejected the original proposal to blockade the Greek ports, they allowed the landing of Colonel Vassos and his men, and they lately proposed, so it was understood, that the Greeks and the Turks should simultaneously withdraw their forces from Crete. It had always seemed to him that the Greeks had one legitimate grievance against the Government, and that was that they were permitted to land in Crete at all, because ever since Colonel Vassos and his troops were allowed to land we, in conjunction with the other Powers, had been endeavouring to turn them out. But apart from that the Greeks had no grievance at all. The Turks had, in his opinion, maintained an extremely correct attitude, but he found nothing to admire in the conduct of the Greeks—indeed he found nothing to admire in the conduct of the Greeks during the last 20 years. It had been said that in this business the Greeks had acted a noble and disinterested part. Assuming that they invaded Crete for the purpose of freeing its inhabitants, the Cretans were at this moment free; they had been practically free from the moment the first detachment of European troops landed in the island. Autonomy had been proclaimed. Why, therefore, did not Colonel Vassos and his troops withdraw? It was contended they were there to restore order. Hon. Members understood what that meant. It meant they were remaining there in order to organise annexation. It was also contended that there was nothing the Cretans desired so much as annexation with Greece. He did not believe it. A nation preferred to govern themselves to being annexed to other countries. As a matter of fact, he believed that on several occasions during recent years the Cretans had expressed their desire to be placed under a British protectorate. [A laugh.] Hon. Members might laugh, but he would refer them to Mr. Stillman, The Times' well known correspondent in Rome, who knew the Cretans better than any person in the House; and, moreover, he believed his statement would be corroborated by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs. [Mr. Curzon: "Hear, hear!"] Any hesitancy on the part of the Cretans to express a wish for independence was easily explained; it was owing to the fact that the Greek troops and the emissaries of Greek secret societies had absolute control of the island. Because the Greeks were not allowed to annex Crete they were desirous of making war on the Turks in Macedonia. It was asserted by many of the correspondents in Athens that the Greeks would be quite ready to abandon all claim to Crete if they obtained an accession of territory in Macedonia. If that were so, what became of their humanity and patriotism? Under such circumstances why should we, or any other European nation, shrink from resorting to coercion if it were necessary? The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean asked whether they were prepared to sacrifice the King of Greece by their action? It was highly probable that the dynasty was in danger. The King, no doubt, found himself in a very unpleasant position. But that was a question of minor importance. Dynasties in the Balkan States came and went. It was by a pure accident that his noble Friend, one of the junior Lords of the Treasury, was not at this moment Crown Prince of Greece. [Laughter.] Instead of being Crown Prince of Greece he was chairman of the Kitchen Committee—[laughter]—no doubt a position of dignity and responsibility. Could it be seriously urged that, for dynastic considerations, we were to leave the European Concert? ["Hear, hear!"] He was astonished that the right hon Baronet, a gentleman with pronounced Radical views, should, for such a reason, advocate this course. Everybody knew the extraordinary and almost insane distrust and suspicion that prevailed on the Continent with regard to this country. Could they imagine anything more calculated to increase that distrust and want of confidence than that we should leave the European Concert at this moment? ["Hear, hear!"] It would instantly be said that we got out of the difficulty for our own profit and advantage. The Cretan question, important as it might appear, was really only a small incident in the whole Eastern question. The Ambassadors had for some time been occupied in elaborating a general scheme of reforms to be applicable to the whole of the Turkish Empire. These reforms were necessary, not only for the welfare of the subject races of the Porte, but for the maintenance of the peace of Europe. Were right hon. Gentlemen opposite ready to destroy this hope because they approved of the action of a recalcitrant Power at the present moment? They were told that there were only six Members of the Party opposite who were prepared to dissent from that policy; and he should expect to see them drummed out of the Party for refusing to bow the knee to the Liberal Forward programme. But he honestly and firmly believed that if the Leader of the Opposition had been in office during the last few weeks he would have acted in precisely the same way as the Government had done, and would have followed the very course which he had denounced that night. [Cheers.]

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE (Leeds, W.) said they had obtained the minimum of information from the Government on the darker aspects of the Eastern question, and had failed to elicit what their policy was. The Leader of the House told them that the European Concert had done something, but he did not say what. So far as the Liberal Party were concerned, if the European Concert would do anything for good they would be all in favour of it. But during the last three years they had been unable to see that it had done anything at all for good. The only thing it had done was to compel the resignation of the will and power of this country into the hands of the other European Powers. If he had to choose a text on which to speak on this subject he would quote the words uttered by Lord Rosebery last year. What did he say?

> "Diplomatic pressure is not limited to war or bombardment or blockade. No one can read the recent correspondence without seeing that as regards the idea of putting pressure upon the Sultan there has been an absolute destitution of any idea except to get the other Powers to join with us in putting pressure upon him, and, when that fails, there has been an absolute negation of any action at all."

The policy of Her Majesty's Government had not changed since those words were uttered, and he did not suppose that Lord Rosebery had changed his mind. The Government had not explained why they objected to the union of Crete with Greece. They said that they were prepared to give to Crete the constitution of Samos, but not the position of Cyprus or Bosnia and Herzegovina. Surely that was a very fine distinction to make, having regard to the consequences involved. ["Hear, hear!"] The object of the Government was supposed to be the prevention of a general scramble; but by refusing the union of Crete with Greece they were doing their best to bring it about. The Turks and Greeks were facing each other on the frontier, and a catastrophe might occur at any moment. The right hon. Gentleman had thrown no light on the question with respect to which the Opposition had sought for information. All they knew of the scheme of autonomy was that the Cretans were not to have the right to choose their own chief. What were the Powers going to do about Colonel Vassos, who was provisioned for months? Were the ships of the Powers to blockade Crete all through the summer. [Cheers.] And in that blockade, was England to do the work of Europe? England had 15 ships engaged in the blockade, and the other five Powers had only 13 altogether.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: That is not so. The Italians alone have 12.

AN HON. MEMBER: Are they torpedo boats?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: The Italians have five ironclads there.

MR. H. GLADSTONE said that he accepted the correction. He had taken his figures from The Times, and in future he should be more careful in quoting The Times as an authority. ["Hear, hear!"] At any rate, we were providing more ships than any other Power. What was Germany doing? Germany took the lead in the policy of the blockade. How many ships had she sent?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: One. [Derisive Opposition cheers.]

MR. H. GLADSTONE said that, after all her furious fulminations against Greece, Germany could only send one ship and had sent no soldiers at all.

[Cheers.] We had to bear the brunt of the task. But if Colonel Vassos were dislodged—and 30,000 or 40,000 men would be necessary to do that—who was going to take in hand the reorganisation of a conquered country? The Government had given no indication as to how the crisis on the Greek frontier was to be stopped; and the necessary conclusion was that neither the Government of this country nor those of the other Powers knew how to settle the question. They were drifting along from day to day without any definite policy, and trusting to the Concert of Europe to do something, although for the past three years it had failed to do the very thing for which it was brought into existence. [Cheers.]

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY and Mr. LABOUCHERE rose together, each looking to the other to give way.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am not going to make a long speech.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: Nor am I. [Laughter.]

Mr. LABOUCHERE having given way,

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square), said: I only rise, as the Leader of the House is unable to speak again, to remind the House that there was an arrangement come to, with the general assent of both sides, that this Debate should close about Ten o'clock. The Government had originally intended that the Necessitous School Board Bill should be taken this evening, and, if necessary, continued to-morrow. But for the general convenience, and in deference to the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, it was settled that the School Board Bill should be postponed, that this Debate should conclude about Ten o'clock, and that the Agricultural Board (Ireland) Bill should be introduced to-night. I am sure both sides will feel that effect should be given to an arrangement so come to. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. LABOUCHERE said that he was not going to make a long speech. But the other day the Leader of the House had compared him to an eminent Nonconformist divine—[much laughter]—who preached 40 sermons from the same text. If he thought the 41st sermon would have more effect with the Government than the preceding 40 he might attempt it, but he could not hope for that. The Resolution before the House was that the House should adjourn for a fortnight. In view of the thorough distrust which hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had for Her Majesty's Government, and in view of the serious crisis in the East, with the possibility of something occurring which might precipitate us into war, he did not think that the Parliamentary eye should be closed on the Treasury Bench. [Laughter.] He liked a holiday just as much as hon. Gentlemen opposite, but there were times when private pleasure must yield to public business. [Loud Ministerial laughter.] This, he was sorry to say, was one of them. Under these circumstances, he begged to move as an Amendment to omit the words "That this House at its rising do adjourn until Monday 26th April." [Laughter.]

CAPTAIN PIRIE seconded the Amendment.

The House divided:—Ayes, 210; Noes, 49.—(Division List, No. 170.)

The announcement of the figures was received with loud Ministerial laughter.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) entered a protest against the general course which the Government had adopted in the conduct of their business up to Easter, and he asked for some information as to the course of business for the remainder of the Session. The Government had enjoyed unexampled opportunities in the conduct of their business; no one on his side of the House had endeavoured in any way needlessly to embarrass them. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] The Government had made a series of distinct pledges on the question of Irish education, but the question was now no nearer a settlement than it was three years ago. Again and again the Government had also promised to deal with the Irish Universities, and the First Lord of the Treasury had this Session pledged himself to deal with the question. The right hon. Gentleman had asked for a specific pledge from the Irish Members and the Irish hierarchy that a seat of liberal learning should be established in Ireland in which the arts and sciences would be taught, and whether the Bishops in Ireland were in a position to meet Her Majesty's Government on that point. It had been stated in officious newspapers which supported the Government that the failure to deal with this question had been due, not to the Government, not to the Lord Lieutenant, not to the Chief Secretary, but to the Irish hierarchy. He gave an emphatic denial to that statement, and he said that the failure to deal with the question rested upon those who had broken faith in the House and with the Roman Catholics in Ireland. As this question had remained unsolved ever since the right hon. Gentleman issued his memorable election address at Manchester ten or twelve years ago, he should like to know how much longer the pledge was to remain unfulfilled. As to the Bill for the Board of Agriculture, the Government had not been pressed by the Irish Members to bring it in, and the Government were not pledged to deal with the subject.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will not be in order in referring to the Bill which is down on the Paper.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that the Irish Secretary, to whose conscientiousness he desired to pay every tribute, had recently told his constituents that his desire was to bring home to the minds of the Irish people the fact that the Government of this country were their friends and not their foes. He did not himself regard the Government as the friends of the Irish people, but rather as their enemies. [Laughter.] His mind was open on the question, and he desired that the Government should remove his prejudice if they could do so. This Session they had had only few opportunities of discussing the policy of the Government, and such opportuities as had been given them had generally been abridged by the Closure. To-night, at a time when the Government were about to spend further sums—at the demand of a very respected Member, it was true, of their own Party—why were the voices of the 80 Catholic Members from Ireland disregarded, and the Government's own pledges derided? [An hon. Member: "Are they all Catholics?"] Greatly to their honour, some Nationalist constituencies had returned a group of 12 or 13 Protestants, who were just as much in favour of a settlement of this Education question as the Catholic Members were. In connection with educational matters, the Government were in the hands of the little Orange clique returned from the north-east corner of Ireland. No English Member had protested against the establishment of a national University for Ireland, but all through Ireland, ever since the First Lord of the Treasury made his speech, the tap of the Orange drum had been heard, and the Government were asked whether they were going to place education in Ireland under the control of the Pope. [Mr. Wolff: "Hear, hear!"] That, of course, was cheered by the eminent Irishman opposite who sat for Belfast. [Laughter.] What was the Irish policy of the Government to be during the remainder of the Session? The Government had refused the Nationalist Members every concession in connection with the subject of education; they had trampled on the Treaty of Union as their forefathers trampled on the Treaty of Limerick, and they had disregarded their own pledges given in that House. Yet they professed to wonder why the Irish people distrusted them. The failure of the Government to keep their pledges respecting education was in no sense due to the action of the Irish Bishops, who had been quite willing to endeavour with the Government to arrive at a solution of the question in no narrow or bigoted spirit. If nothing had been done the fault lay with the faithlessness or powerlessness of Her Majesty's Ministers.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central) rose to ask leave to introduce a Bill for establishing a Department and a Board for the purpose of promoting agriculture and other industries in Ireland. He said that if the hon. and learned Member for Louth was under the impression that the Government had not promised to bring in a Bill for establishing a Board of Agriculture in Ireland, he was in error. The intention of the Government to introduce such a Measure was announced in the Queen's Speech in 1896, and a Measure had atcually been drafted at that time. Want of time and opportunity, however, prevented the introduction of the Bill, but he could not altogether regret the delay that had occurred, because it had enabled the Government to take advantage of the valuable and interesting Report of the Recess Committee, which was published after that Bill had been drafted. No one could doubt that that was a very remarkable document indeed. In a country like Ireland, where political divisions and differences were so strongly marked, it would, he thought, be admitted that it was singular and indeed phenomenal to find a body of men representing every shade of political opinion co-operating together as in this case. He thought that every one of the Committee was to be congratulated on that fact, particularly his hon. Friend (Mr. Horace Plunkett). He thought that little short of a revolution had been accomplished. They had carefully considered the Report of the Committee in regard to the Bill to be introduced that evening. If they had not been able to adopt all the recommendations in their precise form it was not from any want of sympathy. He would first direct their attention to the title of the Bill. It was a Bill for establishing a Department and a Board for the purpose of promoting agricultural and other industries in Ireland. The House would observe that there was a distinction drawn, and it might be asked what were the functions and constitution of these bodies respectively. As was well known, the functions exercised in connection with agriculture in Ireland were distributed amongst five or six different departments. There were the Privy Council, the Land Commission, the Board of National Education, the Board of Works, the Registrar-General's office, all of which were intrusted with powers and duties connected with agriculture. It was proposed to transfer them to the new Department. It was also provided that there was to be practically a new Minister, so that it would be seen that the new Department corresponded to the Agricultural Department for England. But it was not desired that it should be confined to agriculture. It was styled in the Bill a Department for Agriculture and Industry in Ireland. The Bill as it stood did not perhaps convey a full justification for that title, for so far as industry was concerned it did not give powers to the Department beyond what were involved in the transference to the Department of the powers and duties of the Registrar General in reference to the collection of certain statistics and also certain powers of co-operation which the Department possessed in the industrial work of the Board. But it was the intention of the Government, he trusted, during the present Session, to introduce a Measure, intended to supplement the present Bill, providing for industrial technical education in Ireland. He was authorised by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that he was prepared to provide a substantial sum for the purpose of aiding industrial technical education in Ireland, and the administration and allocation of that sum would be assigned to the new department. So far as its agricultural functions were concerned, the new department had for its counterpart the Board of Agriculture of England; but there was no counterpart in England for the new Agricultural Board they proposed to create. The nearest analogy to the new Agricultural Board was to be found in another Irish institution formed six or seven years ago—namely, the Congested Districts Board of Ireland. The Agricultural Board was intended to perform for Ireland generally duties and functions analogous to those now performed by the Congested Districts Board for the congested districts of Ireland. He wished to make it perfectly clear that this Board was not to be secondary to or dependent in any way upon the Department. On the contrary, it was to be a perfectly independent Board with a separate corporate existence. It was not to be subjected either to the Treasury or to the Irish Government. ["Hear, hear!"] It was to have a perfectly free hand, subject, of course, to the provisions of the Act and the control of the Auditor General, with the funds placed at its disposal, and it was to have the power to appoint and dismiss its own servants. The powers and functions of the Board covered, roughly speaking, the whole field of agriculture, fisheries, home and cottage industries, and also included the promotion of technical instruction in those subjects.

MR. CARSON asked, were the functions of the Fishery Commissioners to be transferred to the new Board?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that the Fishery Commissioners had certain judicial functions, and it would be inconvenient for their duties to be transferred to an administrative department of the Government. The Board was also to be intrusted with certain special powers, such as the improvement of land by arterial and other drainage. The Board was to consist of not more than 12 members. Three of the members were the President and the Vice President of the Department and the Agricultural Commissioner. The other members, to a number not exceeding nine, were to be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, like the members of the Congested Districts Board, as far as possible irrespective of Party, and with a view to the functions and duties they were to discharge. It would be seen that, so far, the Government had followed very closely the analogy of the Congested Districts Board, both in regard to the functions and the constitution of the new Agricultural Board. The question would naturally arise whether it would not be better that the two Boards should be amalgamated. That matter had been under their careful consideration, and he thought a great many arguments might be urged in its favour, but this Board was a new Board which they were creating as an experiment, whereas the Congested Districts Board was an established institution which so far had been a remarkable success. [Cries of "No!"] So far as it had gone it had been a remarkable success. He should not like to put into this Bill a provision for amalgamating the two Boards unless he was assured that there was a general agreement on the part of the Irish Members that such an amalgamation was desirable. So far as the Bill was drafted they had left the Congested Districts Board as it now stood, save that the Vice President of the Department of Agriculture would be henceforth a member of that Board. There was one novel principle which they had introduced to which no counterpart was to be found in the case of the Congested Districts Board, although the principle had been given effect to in several Continental countries, and he believed in every case with great success. The Board was directed to draw up, with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant, regulations for the formation of a consultative council, which should consist partly of members representing agricultural societies and organisations, and partly of members to be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, who would naturally represent agricultural interests. He thought it would be generally recognised that the success of such a Board as they proposed to set up in this Bill would largely depend upon whether they could get into real and close touch with the people whose interests it was intended to benefit. ["Hear, hear!"] It would also depend very largely on the extent to which they could utilise organisations and societies such as those which already existed in Ireland, and which he hoped might be multiplied as time went on. It was absolutely necessary for the Board, if it was to be really efficient in its action, to be in close touch with the people. He did not think it was likely that any difference of opinion would arise as to the necessity of working through organisations. That, in his opinion, was absolutely proved by the experience of foreign countries, and the elements of that were set forth in the Report of the Recess Committee. It might be a platitude to say that the most difficult persons to help were those who could not or would not help themselves; but in practice it was sometimes forgotten that in Ireland farming for the most part was done on a very small scale, and it was absolutely necessary, if the farmers were really to be put in a position to help themselves, that it should be done through organisations and co-operation. In spite of some conspicuous exceptions, very valuable work was done in Ireland by associations like the Royal Dublin Society and the North-Eastern Agricultural Society; but it must be admitted that in agricultural organisation and co-operation Ireland was still backward as compared with many agricultural countries on the Continent. The exertions of his hon. Friend the Member for South Dublin had already done something to produce a very desirable change in that direction, and he believed that the creation of a Board of Agriculture such as he had now sketched out, assisted in its deliberations by a consultative council, would have the effect of promoting to a very large extent the formation of new organisations and societies. These smaller organisations would enable the Board to come into touch with the people of the country generally in the very way to which they attached so much importance.

Mr. DILLON asked what would be the powers and functions of the Council?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Merely consultative. The idea was that it should meet so many times a year in conference with the Board, that the latter might be fully informed of the views and desires of the farmers in Ireland generally and their organisation.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): What will be the means at the disposal of the Board?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he was coming to the question of finances. But he was on somewhat difficult ground pending the Report of the Financial Relations Commission. Hon. Members from Ireland should separate polemical questions from the questions raised in this Bill.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Give us our money.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR reminded hon. Members from Ireland that the funds provided for the Congested Districts Board came from the Irish Church Fund. That was Irish money, and he doubted whether Parliament would have intrusted to the Board power to deal with it, without the interference of Parliament, if the money had been Irish money. [Nationalist cheers.] There was a great deal of force in that. The Board of Agriculture would have a perfectly free hand to deal with the funds at its disposal, and it was thought those funds should be derived from money earmarked in Ireland. So it was proposed that there should be paid to the Board all the sums paid to the Local Taxation (Ireland) Account pursuant to the Local Taxation (Ireland) and Estate Duty Act of last year accruing after March 21 of the present year. That would give to the Board the use of an income of about £150,000 a year, subject to certain sums which they either had to spend for the benefit of the congested districts or to hand over to the Congested Districts Board.

Mr. KNOX asked if that sum would be in addition to the money now spent?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR replied that the sums at present spent would continue to be provided under the ordinary Votes. If the money spent with the consent of the Congested Districts Board amounted to or exceeded £20,000 annually, there would be no further sum payable from the Board of Agriculture to the Congested Districts Board. In addition to this sum there would also be at the disposal of the Board that portion of the Sea and Coast Fisheries Fund reserved by the Land Purchase (Ireland) Act of 1891 for expenditure elsewhere than in the congested districts—a capital sum of £20,000. There was also to be paid to the Board in respect of the duties of the Board of National Education in Ireland an annual sum of £6,000 out of moneys provided for Ireland. As he had already explained, it was the intention of the Government in creating this Board to stimulate and encourage as far as possible the self-help of localities, and with a view to that result provisions had been inserted in the Bill enabling grand juries and boards of guardians to raise special rates for the purpose of carrying out schemes approved by the Board, provided always that the rate so raised should not in one year exceed the sums granted by the Board in aid of the same scheme. He had described the functions and constitution both of the Board and of the Department, and the sources from which the funds to be supplied to the Board were to be derived. He had now only to add some reason for making this distinction between the Board and the Department and to explain their relation to each other. The ordinary powers of the Board and of the Department respectively were sufficiently distinct to prevent the probability of any friction between them. A provision, however, had been introduced enabling both the Department and the Board to cooperate with each other in the discharge of their respective functions. The fact that the three Members of the Department were also to be Members of the Board, would, he trusted, insure harmony and unity of action between the two. It would be seen that the Board and the Department were in this way connected, but at the same time were separate from and independent of each other. What the Government had aimed at was centralisation and organisation of the various functions connected with agriculture which were now scattered among the different Departments, and, on the other hand the extension to Ireland generally of advantages analogous to those which were now conferred on congested districts by the Congested Districts Board. ["Hear, hear!"] It would, no doubt, have been open to the Government to have proceeded upon somewhat other lines. They might have created a Department and also assigned to it the work of the Board; or, again, they might have created a Board and assigned to it the work of the Department only and attached to it a consultative Board possessing advisory but no executive or administrative powers. All these courses had been carefully considered, and the Government came to the conclusion that none was really adapted to the end they had in view. It appeared to them that the work they had assigned to the Department could not be wisely intrusted to the Board, and, on the other hand, that the work of the Board could not be satisfactorily carried out by the Department. The Board was an independent Board. It was not controlled by the Minister who had to preside over it, it was not to be responsible to Parliament, and he did not think it would be wise to intrust to such a Board the administration of Acts of Parliament like the Diseases of Animals Act, under which a considerable amount of public money had to be spent, and which involved the making of a great variety of orders for the compulsory slaughter of cattle, for compensation, and so forth. He did not think these were duties which could properly be intrusted to the Board it was proposed to create; nor did he think it quite fair to the large body of Civil Servants, who, under this Bill would be transferred from the Departments to which they now belonged to a new Department under a Board not responsible to Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] For the work intrusted to the Department it was, in the judgment of the Government, essential that there should be ministerial responsibility and official administration. But, on the other hand, the rigidity of official adminstration, following as official administration did the strict line of precedent, would be ill-adapted to the work intrusted to the Board. The usefulness of the Board would depend to a large extent upon its getting closely into touch with the people it was intended to benefit. Its work would be essentially internal in character, and work of an internal character was not performed very usefully with the rigid methods of administration which were necessarily characteristic of a Government department. What they wanted, therefore, to secure was more elasticity of method, freedom of action, and popular sympathies. These were secured in the Congested Districts Board, and it was to a large extent because they were so secured that that Board had been so successful in the work it performed. ["Hear, hear!"] The third plan, that of creating an executive department, and attaching to it an advisory or consultative body, might be open in a greater or lesser degree to the drawbacks mentioned, and which were incidental to the performance of such work as was assigned to it. The whole of the responsibility would rest on the shoulders of the Minister, and the Board would be reduced, probably, to a nonentity. The Minister would be responsible to Parliament, and necessarily would proceed in the most cautious and tentative manner; and, being exposed in the administration of large expenditure on all sides to political pressure, would in all probability find it necessary for his protection to resort to hard-and-fast rules of action. He thought the plan of a consultative or advisory Board might probably be adopted with advantage in the case of the allocation of the funds for technical education, but would not be equally well adapted to work like that now carried on by the Congested Districts Board. Even with the success of the Congested Districts Board, he was sensible that the proposals involved an experiment, and in some respects a novel experiment. They were bound to face the possibility of it turning out a failure, and they had made provision for that eventuality by providing that the Board might be dissolved by Resolution of both Houses of Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] In that case the Department would become its executor, dealing with its assets and obligations, but personally he looked forward with hope and confidence to the real issue being very different to that. He was convinced that the road to prosperity for rural Ireland lay in the improvement of her methods of agriculture, now wofully backward, and in the encouragement of home industries, which could hardly be said at the moment to exist, along which road other countries not dissimilar in general circumstances, employing methods similar to those now proposed, had already travelled as pioneers, and he saw no reason to believe that the success which those countries had achieved should not be the measure of the success which might fairly be anticipated by following in this track. [Cheers.] He formally moved for leave to introduce the Bill.

Mr. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport) thought Irish Members would excuse him for interposing for a few minutes, he had a special interest in the subject. It appeared to him a bad omen that at the very birth of this proposal provision should be made for its funeral. The right hon. Gentleman, though anticipating the success of the proposal, made provision for its failure, and he also, in his closing remarks, made the statement that improvement in Ireland depended on the development of her agricultural and other industries. That was common to every country.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I spoke of rural Ireland, and her home or cottage industries.

Mr. KEARLEY said if the object was merely to bolster up the home and cottage industries of Ireland time would be wasted on the Bill. He had thought the Government had some profound scheme in view to really develop Ireland's prospects agriculturally considered. That the Bill was intended to develop Irish agriculture he understood, but something in addition was required, some reduction of the heavy burden Ireland bore at the present time. But that was not the question he rose to deal with, and it would be dealt with by those who more thoroughly understood that aspect of the question. The right hon. Gentleman told the House that the very able Report of the Recess Committee came to him, as possibly it did to many others, as a revelation.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I did not say it came to me as a revelation.

Mr. KEARLEY understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that Report was a revelation.

Mr. DANE: He said he read it and appreciated it.

Mr. KEARLEY said he had noted the words the Report was a revelation. It was a revelation, no doubt, but, when it was considered how the interests of Ireland had been intrusted to a miscellaneous collection of Boards, it was no wonder that agriculture in Ireland had been crippled, and for years had hobbled along to no advantage. It appeared to him that this new Board would be a political Board in every sense of the word, instead of being, as it should be, a business Board to deal with a business question. They were to have a Commissioner of Agriculture in addition to nine other gentlemen, who would be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. He would like to know what would be the duties of this Commissioner?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said he would be a permanent official of the Department and a member of the Board.

Mr. CARSON: Will he receive a salary?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Not as a member of the Board, but as the official head of the Department.

Mr. KEARLEY: Will these nine other gentlemen receive a salary?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: No.

Mr. KEARLEY asked what class these other nine gentlemen were to be selected from. Were they to be selected for their knowledge of the question; would they be agriculturists, or traders, or what? It was very necessary they should know this. It appeared to him that the functions of the Department were very wide—much wider than they anticipated. They were to have control of the fishery question. That seemed to be a very big question, and he was inclined to think that they would not have full charge of that question. He should like to know how much of it they were to have control of? The home and cottage industries, he was afraid, were not sufficiently important to set up an official body of this description for. What was really wanted was a practical body dealing, and knowing how to deal with, the possibilities of this agricultural development. If they were going to aim in Ireland at a similar success to that which had been achieved in Denmark, then there was a great deal to be said for the proposal, provided it was not weighted with officialdom and expense. Then he would like to know if this Department was to have entire charge of the adulteration question. The right hon. Gentleman was probably aware that there had been a large number of prosecutions in consequence of the excess of water in Irish butter. There was a disposition amongst the Irish Members to regard Ireland as being exempt from the conditions that were to and would prevail shortly, he believed, elsewhere in the production of this article of butter. He assured Irish Members that they would do themselves the greatest possible injury if they encouraged that idea at all. He trusted that if the Department were set up it would deal stringently with the question of adulteration, because it was perfectly impossible for Ireland to prosper as an agricultural country unless it could be thoroughly established and made clear to the distributors and consumers of Irish products that those products were pure. If the Department did no better work than that it would do a very good work for Ireland. He noticed that the Board was to draw up regulations for the consultative council. What were to be the functions of the consultative council? It would give advice, no doubt, but was it to take the responsibility of finding markets for the produce of Ireland? In the latter direction the committee of the hon. Member for South Dublin had done excellent work. The great difficulty in Ireland had been that the small producer had been absolutely at the mercy of the middleman, and it would be a very good thing if the Department took steps to protect all kinds of producers, so that they might get the best results for the articles they produced. In Limerick, Cork and Waterford there were regular rings working to the detriment of the small producers. Middlemen in those places made huge sums, while the producers barely made a profit. The right hon. Gentleman said the success of the Board depended upon whether it could get in close touch with the people. What people did he mean? The small farmers only, or with the distributors and consumers as well? £150,000 was to be spent. That was a handsome sum, but it would require to be very carefully dealt out, or else there would be no practical result. If it all went in schemes it would be wasted, but if it was properly applied it would be of the greatest advantage to Ireland. He believed it would be rather difficult to get localities to rate themselves to develop industries when the benefit would go, not to them, but to private individuals. They were told this was an experiment. He honestly and sincerely hoped it would not be a failure. It was a step in the right direction, and, so far as he was concerned, without pledging himself to details, he would endeavour to support the Bill as far as he could.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said he did not think any Irish Member would complain of the hon. Gentleman, whose action in taking an interest in this question was in strong contrast with the action of his leaders, who were conspicuous by their absence. He did not think any Member, much less an Irish Member, would be inclined off-hand and without seeing the Bill in print, to express a full opinion upon its value. The Chief Secretary had dwelt upon the value of the Report of the Recess Committee, and emphasised the fact that that was a body representing all shades of political opinion in Ireland. But if there was one thing more emphasised than another in the Report, it was the necessity of bringing the proposed Department into close touch with the people. The right hon. Gentleman himself had admitted the desirability of doing that, and yet in the Bill there was a complete absence of any popular representation. For his part, he did not see the necessity of having two bodies. It would have been quite possible to have had one body, and to have popular representation upon it, so that it would have commanded the confidence of the great bulk of the people.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No popular representation is recommended in the Report of the Recess Committee.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: It provided for the creation of councils, the majority of which would be elected by the people. It is true the Bill contains a provision that the Board may frame rules for the creation of Consultative Councils, with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant, but it is quite clear that that is a power which may never come into operation at all.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Board is bound to frame the rules.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND said the Lord Lieutenant would not be bound to approve of them. It was quite clear that if it had been the intention of the Government to give popular representation they would have enacted it as a substantive part of the Measure. This was an example of the method by which Ireland was governed. Nationalist Members, when they brought forward Irish Measures, were told that they only represented a section of the people. But here they had all classes and sections of political parties absolutely united in demanding a Measure, and the English Government, in the airiest possible manner, put their recommendations aside. He was a member of the Recess Committee, and he was most anxious for an effective Measure in helping Irish agriculture and industries. He did not wish to criticise the Government unfairly, but only to get a good Bill for Ireland. One statement made by the Chief Secretary would be regarded with general satisfaction, and that was the undertaking that almost immediately the Government would introduce another Bill dealing with technical education in Ireland. But the broad fact in connection with the finance of the Bill was that Ireland was not receiving a penny from the Imperial Treasury. Ireland was simply allocating her own money to a particular use. Irishmen could not forget that while under the statute of last year Ireland received £150,000 a year, she would, if treated on the same principle as England, be receiving from £700,000 to £800,000 a year. He would not say whether the Government's proposals represented the best method of spending the £150,000. No doubt if it were devoted to relief of rates, the individual advantage would be very small, and he was prepared to spend it on other useful purposes. But the First Lord of the Treasury had declared that the Bill was introduced before the Easter holidays in order that it might be discussed in Ireland during the recess. Well, if the representatives of every class, party, and creed in Ireland were unanimous in wishing for certain changes in the Bill, would their wishes be considered, or would they be disregarded like the recommendations of the Recess Committee? Generally he was in thorough sympathy with the attempt to aid agriculture and industries in Ireland, and with the expenditure of money, even Irish money, upon the purpose, and his one desire would be to make the Bill workable, so that, when it finally passed the House, it might be likely to confer a real benefit on the people of Ireland.

Mr. EDWARD CARSON acknowledged that the Chief Secretary had shown himself thoroughly anxious to master the difficulties that arose by reason of Ireland being a purely agricultural country. He suggested, however, that before the Bill was issued an attempt should be made to make the part of the Bill relating to administration much more simple. When would they be done with setting up new departments in Ireland? [Nationalist cheers.] What always happened was this, that according to the exigency of the case a new department was set up, something was transferred from an old department, and the old department goes on as merrily as before. [Nationalist cheers.] Then they had Members on both sides rising when financial questions were brought up and blaming them because of the great extravagance and the great expenditure in Ireland. While he had no doubt that this Department might be useful as the Congested Districts Board was—and he desired to bear his testimony to the great work performed by that Board—he would like to see some attempt made in the Bill to consolidate some of those Departments. He could not see any reason why the work should not have been carried out by one Board and one set of individuals. He did not see any objection to a Minister being appointed to sit in the House, but he would have preferred to see a new Minister for Ireland, who would have been answerable for all the various Departments connected with land in Ireland. Then he thought that on future occasions they would have some interesting questions as to the administration of the land laws in Ireland generally. But he entered his most emphatic protest against the finance of the Bill. [Cheers.] He was a warm supporter of the attitude of the Government in relation to the financial question in Ireland, but they could not have it both ways. The Government must either treat Ireland as a part of one country, or they must treat it as a separate country. [Cheers.] He complained that this £150,000 which had been cynically called an equivalent grant was entirely inadequate, according to the principles laid down in the Bill of last year, for the relief of agriculture in England. He could not understand why the remedies provided in that Bill for depressed agriculture should not apply to a country which was purely agricultural. [Cheers.] Why was the money to be put to a different purpose from that in England? Were Irish tenants not groaning under the grand jury cess in Ireland, just as English tenants were groaning under county cess in England. The only pretext for adopting a different mode of legislation was that people imagined that because the tenantry of Ireland got reductions in their rents out of the landlords' pockets it was not necessary to give relief out of Imperial funds to the relief of local rates. He protested against this principle of differentiating between the two countries. He was anxious to see this new Board established in Ireland, but he would not be satisfied until a really equivalent grant was given to Ireland for the relief of agricultural ratepayers. Why was that not done? In the Irish papers he saw resolutions day after day, which were passed not by landlords only, or tenants only, but by the representatives of both these bodies, by grand juries as representing the landlords and by tenants the agricultural associations—resolutions calling upon the Government to give them the same relief in respect of their rates as was given last year to agricultural districts in England. All parties in Ireland were united in this demand, and he did not see any justification for withholding the relief for which they asked. He thought the Government, while adhering to this Bill and providing the £150,000 for setting up the new Department, might very well undertake to pass a Measure giving to Ireland the equivalent of what was given to England last year. This was not a demand which came merely from one side of the House. ["Hear, hear!"] Landlords and tenants in Ireland were thoroughly agreed upon the subject. The landlords had no wish to see benefits conferred upon tenants in this country withheld from tenants in Ireland. The better off the tenants were the better it was for all concerned.

MR. T. M. HEALY congratulated the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the patriotic speech which he had made—["hear, hear!"]—and trusted that it would penetrate the minds of Her Majesty's Government. He ventured, however, to tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in a matter of this kind he was regarded by the Government only as a mere Irishman like the rest of them. As long as the right hon. and learned Gentleman was doing the work of the Government in Ireland his voice was a potent voice in their estimation, but the moment he spoke on behalf of Ireland, his efforts were derided and his utterances were disregarded. He should like to know with regard to the Bill whether it was to be a take-it-or-leave-it Bill? Was that the category in which it was to be placed? Was it to have precedence of the Bicycles Bill or the Criminal Evidence Bill? [Laughter.] What was the position of the Government with regard to the Bill? The case of Ireland was so simple that it was ridiculous. They spent a million a year to teach children in Ireland the height of the mountains in Switzerland, and similar rubbish, and now, when they were grown up, they were going to spend £150,000 on teaching them all about liquid manure. [Laughter.] The nomination of the 12 men who were to spend the £150,000 under the Bill was placed entirely in the hands of that admirable nobleman who came from Chelsea—Lord Cadogan. When the Lord Lieutenant nominated the Land Commission he was torn to pieces by the Irish landlords in his own Chamber over the way. How then could he hope to satisfy that insatiable and irreconcilable body the Nationalists, in the nomination of the 12 apostles of agriculture? [Laughter.] Either Ireland was a separate entity or she was not. He believed that, according to the present state of the Government mind, she was not a separate entity. Accordingly she was regarded as part of this great country, and it was asked, why should they not be prosperous like Yorkshire? Why should they not be satisfied like Wiltshire? Why should they not be happy under the glorious Union Jack for which they paid £40 a year to hoist over Westminster? But he would ask any Englishman who was opposed to Home Rule to explain to him as an honest man, or as a financier—he did not care which—[laughter]—how Ireland was not entitled to the same equivalent grant as England, which some people would put at a sum of £700,000 a year? And yet there were opposite a number of Gentlemen who would go down to their constituents and say how dissatisfied those Irish were, what rapperees they were—here was England pouring bounties upon Ireland from her cornucopia, or her pharmacopœia—he did not know which it was—[laughter]—and she was not satisfied—their quack medicines could not satisfy her. Was not the reason that Ireland was only a separate entity for coercion, and other alms of that kind, and that when it came to fiscal gifts the attitude of England towards her was that of a stepfather? Under this scheme this money—not England's money—was to be administered by a Board of 12 gentlemen. How did the English deal with their agricultural matters? They introduced an Agricultural Bill, which he was not aware was one bit better than this Bill, but in spite of that they had since given relief in respect of half of the agricultural rates. [Irish cheers.]

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said the Board of Agriculture in England corresponded to the Department of Agriculture created by this Bill.

MR. T. M. HEALY mentioned a number of Acts relating to agriculture which had been passed in England, but of which they in Ireland had had no counterparts. There were a number of Acts relating to the contagious diseases of animals, they were not to have the benefit of those. He would skip the Tithe Rent Act, as Irishmen, of course, were not to be trusted with their own money. Then there was the Copyhold Act, the Labourers Act, the Enclosures Act, and the different Acts relating to commons. They would like in Ireland to deal with their own commons. If there was one thing they would like to deal with in Ireland it was the question of drainage. There was a remarkable series of Drainage Acts, Improvement Acts, Land Acts, Public School Acts, and Enfranchisement Acts, all applied to England, and the Government thought, when dealing with Ireland and creating what they were pleased to call a popular body, that the Irish people would be satisfied with this miserable thing presented to them. He should have thought that, in dealing with this matter, which, at all events, was Irish, the Chief Secretary would have invited the Irish Members to have met him in one of the Committee rooms upstairs, and said to them, "I have £150,000 of your money in my pocket, and I should like to know what you would like me to do with it?" But he consulted two or three people at the Castle, whom the Irish people had never seen, whose very names they did not know—still their salaries appeared on the Estimates—and he went to Leeds and asked the Irish people to trust him, and he supposed that by intuition and two years' experience he could penetrate into the minds and hearts of the Irish peasants. The Chief Secretary was admitted to be conscientious and hardworking, yet there was never a more powerless Minister. He was not in the Cabinet, which was a crying shame. When the smallest Irish Bill was presented he had to consult Lord this and the other, who were thinking of Crete and Armenia, and never gave a thought to Ireland unless they saw a murder in Ireland reported in The Times. He ought to consult Irish opinion, and, having done that, be in a position to set the Cabinet and the Treasury at defiance. Only in that way would he be successful in administering the affairs of Ireland. He believed the right hon. Gentleman knew what was the cure for Ireland. What was wanted was a native Government, and yet the right hon. Gentleman and his Party made this tinkering compromise. The only way of dealing with Ireland was either to rule her as a Crown colony and a conquered nation, or give her a free Parliament. There was no other means, and it was useless for the Government to think that by making these tinkering sops and doles they could satisfy Irishmen. When they had their own little Parliament in Ireland what were their taxes? £1,000,000 a year, and they were now £8,000,000. What they wanted was to be relieved out of the £7,000,000 England was now robbing them of. That was the Irish question, and that was the only form of an Agricultural Board that would ever satisfy them.

Mr. DILLON said there were two points connected with the Bill on which Irish opinion would be absolutely unanimous. The first of these was the financial basis. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Member for Dublin University that all parties in Ireland would unite in condemning the financial proposals of the Bill. In the Queen's Speech of last year the Government promised an Irish Agricultural Board, and in redemption of that promise it was the duty of the Government to provide out of the Imperial funds the expenses of that Board. They had not done so, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman he would quickly discover that on the financial question there was absolutely no difference of opinion in Ireland—that landlords and tenants, Ulstermen and Munster men, Unionist and Nationalist, would be agreed in condemning this as an exceedingly shabby trick towards Ireland. They claimed their full equivalent grant in relief of the rates in Ireland. As the Government had taken off half the rates of the English farmers, they ought to do the same for the Irish farmers, which would amount to a sum roughly estimated at about £700,000 a year; and, in addition, whatever the expenses of this Board proved to be, they ought to be honestly and frankly provided by the Government out of what was really an Irish fund, though it was nominally out of the Imperial Exchequer. The second point to which he wished to allude was as to the constitution of the Board, and he again agreed to a large extent with what had been said by the right hon. Member for Dublin University. He believed that there would be almost universal condemnation of the utter absence of any popular element on this Board. The Board, the right hon. Gentleman said, should be in touch with popular feeling; but how could it have any popular representation if all the 12 members were to be appointed by Dublin Castle? It would be nothing more nor less than another Castle Board. The three official members would rule the roast, and it would be a mockery to call this an independent body; it would be under official control, and there was no pretence of popular representation. No good purpose, however, would be served in attempting to discuss the details of the Bill now.

Mr. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) said on the question of finance there would be general agreement among Irishmen; but from the other questions raised by the hon. Member finance might be kept entirely separate. Let the other provisions of the Bill be looked at quite apart from the source from which the money was to come. Upon the other point there seemed to be some misconception. The hon. Member appeared to assume that the Lord Lieutenant would appoint an unpopular Board, or a Board of which the farmers could not approve; but there was no warrant for assuming that, and he would have no object in doing so. A sum of money would be handed over to the Board, and the Board would be able to do very much as they liked with it; it would not matter to the Government. An entirely new spirit seemed to be arising in Ireland on these questions. Even the hon. Member for Louth had come out as an industrialist, and he brought in a Bill the other day of which everybody approved—an industry Bill; and, in spite of hon. Members' condemnation of the action of English Governments towards Irish Measures, he believed it had a very good chance of becoming law.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: No. I will bet you. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLUNKETT said he would confer with the hon. Member as to that outside the House. He believed that in the Recess this Bill would receive close attention, and out of the criticism would come suggestions for Amendment that he had great hope the Government would accept. Undoubtedly the Bill would make a considerable demand on Parliamentary time. He had every reason to believe that the Government were in earnest about this Measure, and he wished to accord his most grateful thanks to the Chief Secretary for his labours in this matter, and to wish him every success in this very fruitful and useful legislation.

Mr. R. M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) said that, as representative of an agricultural constituency, and also a member of the Recess Committee, he desired to thank the Chief Secretary for the honest labour he had devoted to this Bill. He said candidly that with some parts of the Measure he was disappointed, but he must also honestly admit the great difficulties with which his right hon. Friend had to contend. It was no simple task for a Chief Secretary, holding the responsible office he did, to tackle the large number of Departments in Dublin Castle which had held sway for so many years, and the heads of which naturally resented any interference with their office. He thought the Chief Secretary had laboured hard to meet the recommendations of the Recess Committee, and he cordially thanked him for what he had succeeded in doing under very great difficulties. When they came to the financial part of the Bill, he saw, not the gentle hand of the Chief Secretary, but the iron hand of the British Treasury, and he for one must protest in the strongest manner against what he believed was another injustice towards Ireland perpetrated by the British Treasury.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) said that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for North Fermanagh might have made a more effective protest had he supported the Instruction which he himself moved last year to the effect that the Agricultural Rates Bill should be extended to Ireland. At present they were very much in the position of shutting the stable door after the horse was stolen, but, in view of the unanimity of the protest, he did not despair that, although a great act of injustice towards Ireland was proposed, Irish Members would be able to penetrate the hide of the British Treasury. The Government had paid half the rates of the English farmer, and they proposed to give to Ireland as an equivalent £150,000 a year, which was to be spent in salaries and for other purposes by a Board in Dublin. Take the position of an individual farmer in Donegal. He calculated that if half the rates of the Donegal farmer were paid for him by the Treasury he would be able to raise his store cattle 15s. a head cheaper than he could raise them to-day. Could even the most enthusiastic advocate of this Agricultural Department say that it was likely to enable the Donegal farmer to produce his store cattle 15s. cheaper than at present? The peasantry of Ireland would be able to understand the hard fact that the most needy agriculturists of the kingdom had been deprived of a benefit which was given to the richest farmers in this country. It was impossible for them to separate the financial part of the Bill from the rest. It was the root of the whole matter, and if they did not protest strongly against it they would be told that they had acquiesced in the creation of these new places and salaries. As to the other part of the Bill, so far as he could understand, it did not transfer a single highly-placed official from any other department in Ireland to this new Board. He felt bound as an Irish Member to protest against the creation of a large number of salaried posts unless there was some reduction of these posts in other directions.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the introduction of the Bill, and still more on the promise of an auxiliary Bill, which would be received with the greatest satisfaction in the North of Ireland. But there would be a general consensus of opinion in Ireland with respect to this financial question, and though he did not advocate the expenditure of a larger sum on this purpose, that was not the end of the matter. He could not admit that this allocation was exhaustive of the claim of Ireland on the joint fund of the United Kingdom. The fact that the city of Belfast unanimously supported the Government on the Financial Relations question was of some value to the Government in the position which they took up; but that support would not be extended to the absolutely contradictory proposition involved in the refusal to Ireland of her equivalent to the Agricultural Rating Act. It was impossible for him to contend to his constituents that there was no obligation on the Government to extend to Ireland the treatment which had been given to England. They had a right to ask on what grounds it was that, agriculture being distressed both in England and Ireland, the same principles of relief were not adopted in the two countries? It was useless to urge that the vote in aid of education in Ireland was to be held as part discharge of the obligation to Ireland; for that education grant was made antecedent to the allocation of the equivalent grant. It would be against his convictions to support this allocation of the money, and Irish Members would be unanimously of his opinion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour and the Attorney General for Ireland; presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday 26th April, and to be printed.—[Bill 204.]

REGULAR AND ELDERS' WIDOWS' FUND [CONTRIBUTION].

Considered in Committee.

Resolved,

"That it is expedient to authorise the Secretary of State in Council of India to contribute, out of the Revenues of India, such sums as may be required to meet certain liabilities under any Act of the present Session to make provision for the transfer of the Assets, Liabilities and Management of the Regular Widows' Fund and of the Elder Widows' Fund to the Secretary of State in Council of India."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday 26th April.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the Third time and passed.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION [CHARGE].

Resolved,—

"That it is expedient to authorise the charge on the Revenues of India of any addition to the Superannuation or Retiring Allowances, which may become payable under any Act of the present Session to remove doubts as to the power of the Secretary of State in Council of India to grant Superannuation and Compensation Allowances in certain cases to Officers on his Establishment."

Resolution to be reported upon Monday 26th April.

PATENT OFFICE EXTENSION [EXPENSES].

*The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's) moved:—

> "That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all expenses incurred by the Commissioners of Works under any Act of the present Session for the acquisition of Land for the Extension of the Patent Office, and for purposes connected therewith."

Mr. T. M. HEALY protested against this constant system of plundering Ireland to pay for English needs.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked how much money was needed?

*Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS said that the acquisition of land would not cost more that £8,000 or £9,000, but the Resolution provided also for the cost of any arbitration under the Lands Clauses Acts—a matter of £200 or £300.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 131; Noes, 11.—(Division List, No. 171.)

Resolution to be reported upon Monday 26th April.

RAILWAY ASSESSORS (SCOTLAND) SUPERANNUATION BILL.

Considered in Committee.

SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCE TO ASSESSOR OF RAILWAYS, ETC., AND CLERKS, ETC., EMPLOYED BY HIM.

Clause 1,—

> On and after the passing of this Act, the assessor of railways and canals for the time being (hereinafter referred to as the assessor) appointed in terms of section twenty of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854, and the clerks or other officers whom he may be allowed to employ permanently in the execution of his duties under that Act, shall each be entitled to such superannuation allowance as may be fixed by the Secretary for Scotland, not exceeding ten sixtieths of his annual salary, with the addition of one sixtieth for every additional completed year of his service beyond ten years.
> Provided as follows:—
> (i.) The allowance shall not, except as hereinafter mentioned, be granted to any person unless he has served for a period of ten years:
>
> (ii.) The allowance of any person shall not exceed forty sixtieths of his annual salary:
> (iii.) The allowance shall not be granted to any person under the age of sixty years, unless he produces a medical certificate to the satisfaction of the Secretary for Scotland that he is incapable, from infirmity of mind or body, to discharge the duties of his situation, and that his infirmity is likely to be permanent:
> (iv.) The allowance of any person shall be calculated on the amount of annual salary received at the time of retirement, if he shall have been in receipt of the same, or in the class from which he retires, for a period of at least three years immediately before retirement; and in all other cases it shall be calculated on the average amount of annual salary received during the three years next preceding the retirement, such average to be fixed by the Secretary for Scotland.

Mr. CALDWELL moved to leave out the words "On and after the passing of this Act." He protested, amidst derisive cheers, against proceeding with the Bill at that hour. The present railway assessor received his appointment on the footing that he was to get the salary attached to the office; but there was no provision whatever for a superannuation allowance. The object of this Bill was to give a superannuation allowance to this assessor. The effect of the Bill, therefore, would be to place the assessor, who was in the position of a judge, and who ought to hold the balance equally in disputes between railway companies and local authorities, under an obligation to the railway companies which promoted the Bill conferring a superannuation allowance on him.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: Order, order! The principle of the Bill was decided on the Second Reading. The hon. Member must confine his remarks to the Amendment he is moving.

MR. CALDWELL (who spoke amid continued interruption) said he would explain the Amendment if he was allowed just half-a-minute. As far as the present assessor was concerned, if the Bill giving him a superannuation allowance were passed he would not be in that position of independence which he ought to be in—

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: Order, order! I told the hon. Gentleman he was not in order in discussing the general principle of this Bill, which has been already decided by the House. He is moving an Amendment, and he must confine himself to that Amendment.

MR. CALDWELL said if the assessor were appointed on the footing that he was to get a superannuation allowance that was a matter of contract. But without any compromise whatever a gift of this kind ought not to be given. He begged to move his Amendment.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE said he could not accept the Amendment. The present assessor had been a very estimable public servant, and it would be very unjust to deprive him of his chance of getting a superannuation allowance.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 127; Noes, 15.—(Division List, No. 172.)

MR. CALDWELL moved, after the words "Secretary for Scotland," to insert the words "with the consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury." The hon. Member pointed out that the superannuation allowance was to be fixed by the Secretary for Scotland. He thought if the Secretary for Scotland fixed the superannuation allowance it should be with the consent of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, because the matter of superannuation was more within the Department of the Treasury, especially as they appointed the assessor.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE said he did not propose to accept the Amendment, because he thought it was quite useless. The calculation of the scale of superannuation was automatic. The whole basis was framed on the Treasury scheme, by which a man got so many sixtieths of his salary, so that what he should get was a mere arithmetical calculation. The Secretary for Scotland was better able to judge whether a person was entitled from his services and otherwise to get a pension, and there was no use to call on the Treasury as guardians of the purse, because they did not pay him.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Does this Bill place this assessor in the same position as the other assessors?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No; the other assessors are prefectly different. The Assessor of Railways is in a position entirely by himself; the other assessors —valuation assessors—are not paid by the Government at all, but by the counties.

MR. CALDWELL said the Lord Advocate was quite in error in representing that under the Bill the superannuation was nothing more than an automatic scale of so many sixtieths, because Clause 2 gave an option to the Secretary for Scotland to add so many years to a man's services as he might think fit, to an extent not exceeding 20 years. If there was power to add to the extent of 20 years' service, and if there was to be that discretion, the Committee would see the Lord Advocate was not correct when he said the Secretary for Scotland had simply to act as a clerk, adding the years' service according to automatic scale.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE said the Secretary for Scotland would be quite as well able as the Commissioners of the Treasury to act in such a case.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CALDWELL said that in dealing with the position of assessors in Scotland the Committee had to deal with a position very much the same as the position of Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, with which the House dealt last year. It was then decided that Chairmen of Quarter Sessions should not get retiring allowances until they had completed 15 years' service. This was not like the case of retiring Civil Servants who had to complete a certain number of years' service; these officers were in a similar position to the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and he therefore moved to leave out the word "ten," and to insert the word "fifteen."

*The LORD ADVOCATE said the Bill was modelled from the general Act, which applied to all Civil Servants, the 22nd Vict., to which the position of those Gentlemen bore more analogy than to the case the hon. Member had mentioned.

Question put, "That the word 'ten' stand part of the clause."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged said, it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 173.)

Mr. HUBERT DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont): On a point of Order, may I ask whether the hon. Members who supported your decision may have their names taken? [Loud laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: The Standing Order says the names of the minority shall be recorded.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Will it be in order to move that the Standing Order be amended?

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: Yes, at the proper time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL rose to move another Amendment when,

Mr. DUNCOMBE claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS declined then to put that Question.

Mr. CALDWELL proposed to leave out the word "sixty," and to insert the word "sixty-five."

*The LORD ADVOCATE said that in this case also the Bill followed the general Act dealing with Civil Servants. He would like to remind the hon. Member that some persons become incompetent long before 65. [Cheers and laughter.]

Question put, "That the word 'sixty' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 15, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 174.)

Mr. CALDWELL rose to move another Amendment, when

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS ruled that the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member was no Amendment at all. [Laughter.] The words proposed were the same as those in the Bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL moved, in paragraph IV. to leave out the word "three," and to insert the word "five."

Mr. DUNCOMBE: I rise to a point of Order. The hon. Member is reading his speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL: I am reading the Bill. [Laughter.]

*The LORD ADVOCATE said that in this respect also the Bill followed the general Act dealing with Civil Servants.

Question put, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and, on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 175.)

Question put, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall), who spoke seated, and amid loud interruption and derisive cheers, said that he wished to raise a point of order. A right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. Seale-Hayne) had not risen in the last Division, either to support or to challenge the Chairman's decision, and he asked whether it was competent for a Member within the House to abstain from voting?

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: There is no necessity for an hon. Member to rise at all. The Standing Order simply says that those who support the decision of the Chairman shall rise, and that those who challenge it shall also rise. There is no power to compel an hon. Member to rise who does not wish to do so. [Cheers.]

Question again put, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and, on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 13, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 176.)

Clause 2,—

COMPUTATION OF ADDITIONAL YEARS TO ASSESSOR.

In the event of the assessor, when appointed as aforesaid, being of an age which would not entitle him, on attaining the age of sixty years, to a superannuation allowance under this Act of forty-sixtieths of his annual salary, the Secretary for Scotland may, by order under his hand, direct that on the retirement of such assessor a number of years not exceeding twenty shall, in computing the amount of his superannuation allowance, be added to the number of years during which he may have actually served as assessor.

Mr. CALDWELL moved to leave out the word "sixty," and insert the word "sixty-five."

*The LORD ADVOCATE opposed the Amendment, stating that there was a precedent for the Clause in the general Act.

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and, on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 177.)

Mr. CALDWELL proposed to leave out the word "twenty," and to insert instead thereof the word "five."

*The LORD ADVOCATE said that 20 years was the number in the 4th Section of the general Act.

Dr. CLARK thought it was an extraordinary power to give to the Secretary for Scotland. Ten years would be sufficient.

Question put, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the Clause."

Question put, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and, on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 179.)

Clause 3,—

LIABILITY OF PERSONS UNDER SIXTY TO BE CALLED UPON TO SERVE AGAIN.

Every person to whom a superannuation allowance shall have been granted under the provisions of this Act, before he has attained the age of sixty years, shall, until he has attained that age, be liable to be recalled to the office of the assessor to serve in the same or a similar capacity to that in which he has previously served, and, if he shall decline, when called upon to do so, to return to such duties, or shall decline or neglect to execute such duties satisfactorily, being in a competent state of health, he shall forfeit his right to the superannuation allowance which has been granted to him."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and, on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 180.)

ALLOWANCE NOT TO RUN CONCURRENTLY WITH SALARY.

Nothing herein contained shall entitle any person to receive any superannuation allowance under this Act concurrently with salary or other remuneration in respect of his performing the duties of an assessor or of clerk or other officer in the employment of such assessor.

Mr. CALDWELL proposed after the word "assessor," to add the words "or in any employment the payment for which comes out of the Imperial Treasury or out of local rates."

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 13; Noes, 124.—(Division List, No. 181.)

Question put, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 14, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 182.)

Clause 5,—

SUPERANNUATION ALLOWANCE FOR OTHER SERVICES TO BE CONSIDERED.

In fixing the amount of superannuation allowance under this Act, the Secretary for Scotland shall take into consideration the amount of the superannuation allowance, if any, granted to the assessor in respect of any service under Her Majesty's Government.

MR. CALDWELL moved after the word "assessor," to insert the words, "and other persons."

MR. DUNCOMBE: I think we have a right to claim from the Leader of the Opposition some declaration of his policy. [Laughter.]

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

Question put, "That Clause 5 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged, said it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed. He accordingly directed the Ayes and the Noes successively to stand up in their places. It appeared that the Noes were 13, and the Chairman declared that the Ayes had it.—(Division List, No. 184.)

Clause 6,—

MODE OF LEVYING AND COLLECTING ALLOWANCES.

All superannuation allowances to be granted under the provisions of this Act shall be levied and collected along with and in the same manner as the remuneration or salary of the assessor and his clerks and other officers, as prescribed in section twenty-nine of the said Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854.

Question, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Clause 7,—

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the Railway Assessors (Scotland) Superannuation Act 1897.

Question, "That Clause 7 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Question put, "That the Bill be reported without Amendment."

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had been asked to make some remarks. He desired to express their joy that they were parting with non-contentious business, and that their votes had been weighed instead of counted.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE moved, "That the Bill be now Read the Third time."

DR. CLARK proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words, "upon this day six months."

MR. T. M. HEALY seconded the Amendment, which he thought most reasonable. His main objection to the Bill was that Ireland should have to pay for a Scotch assessor.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The assessor is paid by the railway companies. [Laughter.]

MR. T. M. HEALY strongly objected to the Third Reading being taken now. The Bill had not proved a non-contentious Measure. [Laughter.]

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes, 72; Noes, 12.—(Division List, No. 185.)

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill Read the Third time, and passed.

Whereupon, in pursuance of the Order of the House of this day, Mr. Speaker adjourned the House without Question put.

Adjourned at Twenty Minutes after Three o'clock in the Morning till Monday 26th April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 26th April 1897.

The House re-assembled after the Easter holidays.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

SPEECHES IN PARLIAMENT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): To call attention to the duration of Speeches in Parliament; and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 11th May.]

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY (JUDICIAL DUTIES, EXPENSE).

MR. CHARLES HARRISON (Plymouth): To call attention to the expense incurred by the Incorporated Law Society in performing the Judicial Duties imposed upon it by 51 and 52 Vic., c. 65; and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 11th May.]

MR. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) gave notice of a Motion in precisely similar terms.

CROWN LANDS AND COMMONS (WALES).

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To call attention to the administration of Crown Lands and the appropriation of Common Lands in Wales; and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 18th May.]

QUESTIONS.

BOTTLING BEER.

MR. R. McKENNA (Monmouth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the bottling of beer is such a process as to constitute any premises in which the same is carried on a factory or workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshops Acts, 1878 to 1895?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The point raised by the hon. Member is not free from difficulty, but I am advised that the Acts do apply in the places mentioned, and they are actually enforced there.

METROPOLITAN AND METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAYS.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the excessive overcrowding of the carriages of the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railways, he will suggest to those Companies that the bye-law approved by the Board of Trade under which a passenger is liable to a fine for travelling in a carriage of a class superior to that for which he is booked should be relaxed when he is unable to find a seat in the class of carriage for which he has taken a ticket?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston, on behalf of Mr. RITCHIE): No, Sir. I understand that my right hon. Friend is not prepared to make the suggestion referred to in the Question to the railway companies, as he doubts whether it would act as a remedy for overcrowding. As a matter of practice, the Board of Trade understand that the companies do not prosecute except in clear cases of intent to defraud.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) asked whether it had not already been decided that under the bye-laws of the railway companies the overcrowding of first class carriages by third class passengers was a trespass in respect of which first class passengers could recover damages?

MR. HANBURY: As the Question of the hon. Gentleman has only just been put into my hands, I am unable to answer it.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the fact that the Atlantic seaboard of the island of Lewis is not included in the North Sea Convention, he will state the reason why the Fishery Board for Scotland fails to make a bye-law to render beam and otter trawling illegal within 13 miles of that part of the Lewis Coast?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I have already answered this Question to the hon.

An Asterisk (*) at the commencement of a Speech indicates revision by the Member.

Member, but shall repeat my answer. While the Atlantic seaboard of the Island of Lewis is not included in the limits of the North Sea as fixed by the North Sea Convention, 1882, it is not permissible for the Fishery Board for Scotland to make a bye-law rendering beam and otter trawling illegal within 13 miles from that seaboard, as the 10th Section of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act, 1895, requires that the sanction of the States Signatories of the Convention be obtained before any bye-law operative within the 13 mile limit can be made on any part of the Scottish coast. The Fishery Board has consequently no power to make the bye-law suggested. On a reference to the 1st Sub-section of the 10th Section, it will be seen that the language employed is as follows:—

> "The Fishery Board may by bye-law or bye-laws direct that the methods of fishing known as beam trawling or otter trawling shall not be used in any area or areas under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty within 13 miles of the Scottish coast," &c.;

while the 3rd Sub-section contains the following enactment, namely:—

> "Provided that no area of sea within the said limit of 13 miles shall be deemed to be under the jurisdiction of Her Majesty for the purpose of this section unless the powers conferred thereby shall have been accepted as binding upon their own subjects with respect to such area by all the States signatories of the North Sea Convention, 1882."

POST OFFICE (HYDE).

Mr. J. W. SIDEBOTHAM (Cheshire, Hyde): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, when the new post office at Hyde will be commenced, what sum has been taken for it in the Estimates, and what amount it is intended to spend upon it; and whether, seeing that nearly 10 years ago the late Mr. Raikes inspected the present post office and pronounced it to be inadequate for the requirements of Hyde, an effort will be made to complete the building at the earliest possible date?

Mr. HANBURY: Provision to the extent of £1,840 is made in the Office of Works Estimates for the current year for commencing the erection of the new post office at Hyde; and it is intended that the work shall be begun as soon as the purchase of the additional piece of ground, which is being acquired from the Corporation, has been completed. The estimated cost of the building, including fittings and furniture, but excluding site, is £2,855. It is understood that the late Mr. Raikes visited Hyde in 1890; but since that date, the old office has been enlarged and improved to some extent.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that the effective branch of the Army Medical Department is and has been for some time much below its authorised strength; whether the cost of the non-effective branch of the Army Medical Department is now nearly equal to, if it does not exceed, the cost of the effective branch; whether he is aware that many of the medical officers who now retire on a pension at the early age of about 45 are willing to remain on the active list; and whether he will take steps to retain on the active list medical officers who now retire in the prime of life, but who are willing to remain on the active list?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Powell-Williams, Birmingham, S.): The establishment of officers of the Army Medical Staff has been below strength, and there are now about 40 vacancies. The non-effective charge is only about half of the effective charge. Medical officers who retire at the age of 45 do so voluntarily, and there is no power to retain them in the service against their will; but they are liable to be recalled to service up to the age of 55 if emergency arises.

Dr FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): May I ask whether it is not the fact that the compulsory clause does not take effect until the officers are 55 years of age?

Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS: That is the fact. Those who retire at 45 retire voluntarily, and all who retire at that age are liable to come up for service if emergency arises.

POSTAL FACILITIES (NEWTOWN CUNNINGHAM, CO. DONEGAL).

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a memorial has been received from Newtown Cunningham, in County Donegal, urging a reconsideration of the answer given last year to an application for further postal facilities in that district; and whether the Postmaster General has yet decided to accede to the request?

Mr. HANBURY: A memorial has been received from Newtown Cunningham, Co. Donegal, urging a reconsideration of the answer given last year to an application for further postal facilities. The Postmaster General was glad to be able last year to accelerate the morning delivery at Newtown Cunningham by about an hour, and thus to meet to some extent the wishes of the memorialists. But the establishment of a second post, which would involve additional expense, was not found to be warranted, the cost of maintaining the existing service already absorbing the whole postal revenue available. The circumstances have in no way altered since the question was previously considered, and the Postmaster General is still unable to accede to the memorialists' request.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS ACT.

*Mr. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will lay before Parliament the circular of the Education Department to the managers of Voluntary Schools relative to the carrying out of the provisions of the Voluntary Schools Act, with the accompanying Minute and forms of inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Sir John Gorst, Cambridge University): The Minute was laid on the Table of the House before the holidays. It is not usual to present the circulars of the Department to Parliament; but if the hon. Member wishes, it will be produced.

Mr. CARVELL WILLIAMS asked when the Minute would be delivered?

Sir J. GORST: It is a question for the printers.

REPLY LETTER CARDS.

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that Mr. Merridew's amended project of reply letter card for international postage is free from the alleged fiscal objection raised concerning it, which would appear to have no foundation in fact; whether his attention has been directed to the fact that under the proposed system reply letter cards could not be purchased in the cheapest market, as suggested, to the detriment of the British postal revenue; and whether, in presence of the safeguards provided, the Postmaster General would favour the scheme, and direct the British postal delegates to support the adoption of the proposed reform at the coming Postal Union Congress?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General does not regard the amended project as free from the fiscal objections already explained, and cannot undertake, on behalf of a single stationer interested in a particular device, to give any such instructions as are suggested. But the House may rest assured that whatever scheme is put forward at Washington will be discussed on its merits.

TELEGRAPH OFFICES (BANK HOLIDAYS).

Sir JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he could see his way to close the smaller telegraph offices on Bank Holidays at the same hours as on Sundays?

Mr. HANBURY: A number of the smaller telegraph offices in towns where there are several are already altogether closed on Bank Holidays, or closed at the same hours as on Sundays; but the Postmaster General fears that much inconvenience to the public would be caused if village telegraph offices which are at a considerable distance from other offices were closed at the same hours as on Sundays.

FRENCH TROOPS IN BAHR-EL-GHAZEL.

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether it is the case, as recently stated by M. Richard Waddington in the French Senate, with the apparent assent of the Minister of the Colonies, that French troops under Lieutenant Liotard now occupy a portion of the Bahr-el-Ghazel, and have probably by this time reached the Nile; and (2) whether Egypt continues to assert her right to the territory thus crossed by a French military expedition, which was the subject of lease by the Earl of Kimberley to the Congo State, and from which the Congo State officers were withdrawn upon representations to that State by France?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): We have so far received no confirmation of the statement referred to in the first paragraph of the Question. The Egyptian Government has not relinquished any of its claims to territory in the basin of the Upper Nile.

ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND).

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the Returns showing that nearly 50,000 children were in the year 1896 in average attendance at Roman Catholic day schools in Scotland, as against 510,000 in the public schools; that nearly 10,000 scholars were in average attendance at Roman Catholic evening continuation schools as against less than 40,000 in the public schools; and that £21,543 was received by these schools from voluntary contributions, being more than double the total amount of the voluntary contributions of all other sections of the people of Scotland to educational purposes; whether he is aware that the parents of the children in the Roman Catholic schools have further to contribute as ratepayers to the support of the public schools in which Presbyterian catechetical teaching is given, but receive no aid from the rates; and whether the Government will, under the circumstances, give to the Scotch Voluntary Schools an equivalent measure of redress to that which has been given to the Voluntary Schools of England?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The condition of Voluntary Schools in Scotland is under the consideration of the Government, and will not be lost sight of in any proposal which the Government may bring forward on the subject.

GREECE AND THE POWERS.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is prepared to make any statement to the House in relation to the war between Turkey and Greece, and the policy of Her Majesty's Government in relation thereto, whether the British Fleet is still engaged in the blockade of Crete, and whether that blockade is directed against the Cretan insurgents or against the Greek belligerents in the island? [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: In answer to the right hon. Gentleman I have to say that Her Majesty's Government, like the rest of the Powers, have agreed to an attitude of neutrality as between the combatants. They are, of course, desirous, as soon as a favourable opportunity presents itself, of offering their good offices as mediators. [Cheers.] With regard to the second Question of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject of the blockade of Crete, the Powers, having already assumed the occupation of the littoral of the island before the outbreak of the war, have determined that it shall be considered neutral. The blockade is maintained for the purpose of preventing opposition to their authority.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will a proclamation of neutrality be issued?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I believe that that is the usual course, and no doubt it will be followed in the present case. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a report which has appeared in several of the newspapers that during the recent battles between the Turks and the Greeks several wounded Greek soldiers who fell into the hands of the Turks were shut up in a Christian church to which the Turks set fire, burning both the Church and the wounded Greek soldiers, and whether he can confirm or deny the truth of the Report?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question, may I ask him whether his attention has been called to a statement in to-day's newspapers that great cruelties have been inflicted on captured Turks by the Greeks, amongst other things by placing live coals upon them?

MR. CURZON: My attention has not been called to either of the reports mentioned by the hon. Gentlemen, and the Foreign Office has no information either corroborating or contradicting them.

MR. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Standard of the 21st inst. that the Turkish Embassy in London have asserted that certain Englishmen, including officers of the British Army, have volunteered to fight on the Turkish side in the present war, and whether he is able to state that such report is true or not?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question—[ironical cheers and laughter]—may I ask whether the statement is true that Captain Birch and a number of Englishmen have volunteered their services and are fighting on behalf of the Greeks? ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

MR. CURZON: I must give the same answer to both Questions that I gave before—namely, that we have no information on the subject.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING IN THE MORAY FIRTH.

MR. WEIR asked the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the fact that the Jackal was stationed at Aberdeen to prevent the landing from the German trawler Alster of fish caught in the prohibited waters of the Moray Firth, he would state whether a cruiser had been sent to the Moray Firth to protect the interests of the line fishermen during the temporary detention of H.M.S. Jackal at Aberdeen?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The Alster left Aberdeen on Saturday. Her destination was said to be Hull, and I believe that she has arrived there and discharged her cargo. I am not aware that there is any necessity for the further protection of the Moray Firth, and I do not apprehend that H.M.S. Jackal will be detained much longer in Aberdeen.

RAILWAY ASSESSORS (SCOTLAND) SUPERANNUATION BILL.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said that he desired to bring under the notice of Mr. Speaker a question affecting the procedure of the House in regard to what took place at the last sitting. It appeared from the printed Votes and proceedings which were delivered to hon. Members on the morning of the commencement of the recess, that in the course of the sitting of the previous day the Railway Assessors (Scotland) Superannuation Bill passed through Committee, and that thereupon a Motion was made and the Question proposed that the Bill be read a Third time. An Amendment was proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." A division was taken with the result that 72 voted Aye, and 12 voted No. The object he had in bringing the matter forward was that he was always under the impression—and he thought most hon. Members shared the same impression—that, unless with the general consent of the House, no stage of a Bill could be taken at any one sitting other than that stated on the Order Paper for that day. He was aware that there had been occasions on which this general rule had been departed from. He himself remembered in one of the early divisions in which he took part in 1866 that the Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Bill was introduced, passed through all its stages in this House, sent to the other House, and the Royal Assent communicated to this House in the course of the same sitting. But apart from legislation promoted on the ground of urgency of a national character, the general practice had been undoubtedly as he had stated it. He quoted from the "Rules, Orders, and Forms of Procedure relating to Public Business," and from May's "Parliamentary Practice," and said that having looked at all the references to cases cited, he found they were all cases where obviously the consent of the House was given. The question had been raised before now as one of order, with the result that a decision by Mr. Speaker's immediate predecessor had been delivered, and also one by Mr. Speaker Brand. Mr. Speaker Peel, in August 1890, said:—

> "It frequently happens late in the Session, when urgency is in the nature of the case, that two or more stages of one Bill are taken at the same sitting"; and he went on to say that,

> "it is not a question of leave of the House, but of the vote of the House. Acting on that opinion, and in accordance with other precedents, I have myself on two occasions—the only occasions I can recall—done so."

Looking at all the decisions one by one, he thought it was clear that the only cases in which an exception had been made to the general practice had been when a Measure had the general assent of the House, or was promoted on the ground of extreme urgency, as in the case of the Bill of 1866. He drew attention to the matter because he thought that in the future it was by no means improbable that majorities drawn from one side or the other might be tempted not only to do what had been already done to obviate altogether the Report stage by resisting all Amendments, but to take advantage of the principle which would be established, that immediately, at the same sitting, a Motion would be made for the Third Reading of a Bill. He desired also to draw attention to the special conditions under which the sitting upon that day was being conducted, owing to the specific Order of the House embodied in the Motion for the Adjournment for the holidays, which ran as follows:—

> "That the Government business, as far as and including the Order for the Committee on the Railway Assessors (Scotland) Superannuation Bill, may be entered upon this night at any hour, though opposed, and be not interrupted under the provisions of the Standing Order, Sittings of the House; and that, so soon as such business is disposed of, Mr. Speaker do adjourn the House without question put."

Therefore, although he did not attach so much importance to that breach of order as to the departure from general practice which he had first mentioned, he submitted that the taking of any stage of the Bill in question, except for Committee, was a distinct breach of the specific Order of the House made at the commencement of that sitting. That being so, he desired to ask Mr. Speaker whether the proceeding in question was regular, or whether there were special features in the particular case which would not enable it to be quoted as a precedent in the future?

*MR. SPEAKER: Perhaps I had better state first my recollection of what actually did take place at the last sitting of the House. The Bill referred to passed through Committee after a discussion of some two hours, and when I came into the Chair, the Motion was made "That the Bill be now read the Third time." No objection was taken on the point of order to the Third Reading, but the hon. Member for Caithness immediately rose in his place, and proceeded to move that the Bill be read a Third time that day six months. An hon. Member, in supporting that Amendment, did object, not by way of raising a question of order, but as a matter of argument, to the Third Reading being taken the same night of a Bill which, he said, was a contentious Bill. Therefore the particular point which the right hon. Gentleman now takes was never raised. But as the right hon. Gentleman asks me what my ruling would have been, assuming objection had been taken, I may say that I do not understand the Rule to be as broad as he seems to suggest. There is no absolute rule that the Third Reading cannot be taken immediately after the Report without the universal assent of the House. It is the more ordinary practice of the House—which, probably, it would desire to continue in the majority of cases—that only one stage should be taken at a time; and, in the case of a really contentious Bill, debated between the two sides of the House, two stages should not be taken at the same sitting. With regard to the ruling to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, in which Mr. Speaker Peel gave an opinion that it was not a question of leave like the withdrawing of a Motion, but of the vote of the House, I think that correctly states what is the Rule of the House. If the question is proposed and objection is raised, the House then has the right to determine whether it will take the Third Reading or not. I do not think that that question has been pressed against objection taken, except in cases where there has been something exceptional in the extent or character of the opposition. The decision of Mr. Speaker Peel seems to me to have carefully laid down what the Rule is; and I may point out that since then, as lately as June 2, 1892, when the Clergy Discipline Immorality Bill was before the House, and when there was no urgency, there was a debate on the Report stage, and several Amendments were moved and divisions taken by a minority limited in number. After the conclusion of the Report stage, the Third Reading of the Bill was asked for. The question was put, and there was a division, when the question was carried by 135 to 14 votes. And there are other precedents.

As regards the other point raised—namely, that the particular Resolution under which the House sat upon that Monday prevented the proceedings of which the right hon. Gentleman complained—I may point out that that rule did not prevent anything from being done which could in ordinary circumstances have been done under the Order for the Committee on the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] If there had been no such Resolution on that Order being called, and the Committee stage taken, and Report made without amendment, the Third Reading might have been moved and taken. There was, therefore, nothing in the Resolution which could prevent the House from disposing of all business which could under ordinary circumstances have been dealt with under that particular Order of the Day. For these reasons I think that the proceedings were in order.

WINE AND BEERHOUSE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred from this day till Wednesday 30th June.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) complained of the great difficulty in which the House was placed in proceeding to discuss an important Measure like this so early after the holidays—a difficulty which was well illustrated by the extraordinary return which had been circulated by the Education Department. The return purported to be a list of the necessitous schools throughout the country which were to be aided by the Bill. One would think that some common principle was applied to these schools, and that something like equal treatment was meted out to them. In working out the results shown in the return, he found that there were 28 School Boards which received the munificent sum of £1 each, and 186 School Boards which received between £1 and £10. The results in counties were still more extraordinary. In Bedfordshire the Bill would give 5s. per scholar, but in Buckinghamshire the amount was only 2s. 7¼d. In Cornwall the amount was 3s. 1d., in Devon 5s. 5d., in Dorset 1s. 11d. It was therefore evident that the principle of the Bill did not apply fairly. The anomalies were worse in the case of particular Boards in the same county. In Berkshire one School Board, with a rate of 9d., received 1s. 7d. per scholar, and another with a rate of 9½d., with practically the same number of children and conditions, received 3s. 6d. In Bedfordshire, for one School Board the grant would be 2s. 7d. per scholar, while another School Board in the same county received 5s. 5d., the rate being a penny more. The whole return was full of anomalies, and it illustrated how unequally the principle of the Bill worked. London, however, was treated worse than any part of the country. No grant of any kind was given to London. It was said that London had no necessitous schools, but the return showed how false was the statement. Just outside the borders of London some School Boards in Essex received the largest amount under the Bill, but in the East End of London, where there were just as many necessitous schools, nothing was given. Owing to the system of rating spread over London, the rich districts contributed to the necessitous schools, which were thereby supported. Why should not a similar principle be laid down with regard to Voluntary Schools? Under the Voluntary Schools Act, London received only £44,000, but her contribution under the Act would be at least £140,000. He thought hon. Members who represented London divisions ought to look into this matter. Out of 60 Members, there were 52 sitting on the opposite side of the House who supported the Government. They had London in the hollow of their hands, and the result was they were laying this iniquitous financial burden on London for the benefit of the rest of the country. There was another feature to which he wished to direct attention. They were laying on this large grant without any equivalent grant being made to Ireland. He said that the Irish Members ought to devote more attention than they seemed inclined to do. They voted for the grant to the Voluntary Schools without ever raising this principle, that Ireland had to contribute part of the money. Now there was a further grant of only £120,000, but Ireland would have to contribute its share. He thought such a grant should be watched with jealous care. The Bill, no doubt, was a short Bill, and it seemed to be in the larger part a quotation from the Bill of 1870. As his hon. Friend said, no doubt it was going to be ram-rodded through the House, but before it passed they ought to work more on the points to which he referred, and maintain the principle of equality of treatment which had been upheld to the present time.

*MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) proposed to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add instead thereof the words

> "In the opinion of this House, no Bill making further provision for aiding School Boards will be satisfactory which does not at least provide a sum amounting in the aggregate to five shillings per scholar for the whole number of scholars in average attendance at Board Schools in England and Wales."

He said this Bill was on a par with all the previous performances of this Ministry, who had been occupied since the last election in keeping up its record of broken promises. Their policy had been to sacrifice principles and pledges in paying their supporters out of the pockets of the taxpayer. Few things would discredit them more than the way they had thrown away a great opportunity in this matter of education. The Government had a great majority and enormous surpluses. But their policy in the two Bills of this Session amounted to this—that they were not trying to help education, but to promote the interests of one class of schools. They stuffed to repletion the treasury of the Voluntary Schools, while they starved the Board Schools to make them unpopular. ["Hear, hear!"] Either the whole of the cry about the suffering ratepayer, which had been the staple topic of the Tory candidates on every platform in the last two general elections, had been insincere and unreal, or else this Bill convicted the Tory Party of a flagrant breach of faith. The First Lord of the Treasury, in introducing the Voluntary Schools Bill, had said they had always been in favour of relieving the hard-pressed ratepayers. After looking at the Return he could not understand how the First Lord of the Treasury could look a Lancashire ratepayer in the face again. Why should the ratepayers who, in the exercise of their own judgment and civic rights had imposed on themselves rates for educational purposes, receive no consideration? The 53 Boards of Lancashire expended close upon £303,000 on their schools; but under this Bill—this generous Bill—only four Boards would receive £291, or 10d. a child, and most of this went to Barrow. [Laughter.] There were 13 other county boroughs in Lancashire spending £250,650, but under this Bill they would not get a farthing; but if Lancashire was treated on the principle of absolute equality it would get a sum of nearly £30,000. Why were the Lancashire ratepayers, who expended out of rates £303,000, and altogether about £800,000 on education, to get no help whatever? It was worse still as to London, which spent nearly three millions, and it was not to get a farthing of help. By right London ought to have £100,000 given to it. In the 64 great county boroughs, excluding London, the ratepayers contributed to educational purposes £1,225,000, or ten times as much as the voluntary subscribers contributed to their schools. Yet the great boroughs were to receive only about £45,000, and of this sum £30,000 would go to five towns. The Bill would not deal fairly with the great boroughs, which had imposed upon themselves many burdens in the interests of education. The help given in the county boroughs under this Measure would amount only to 10½d. per child. What ought to be done was to deal with both classes of schools on equal terms, and to grant for the relief of the ratepayers an aggregate sum calculated according to the whole number of the children in average attendance. That plan should be adopted, and then the 64 county boroughs would receive £153,000 without London, and London being added £256,000. In these boroughs the efforts of voluntary subscribers were represented by £210,000, and those efforts were to be met by a grant of £191,000 out of the Treasury. But the volume of the rates imposed upon these populations by their own authorities amounted to £2,700,000, and their efforts were only to be met by a miserable grant of £45,000. The ratepayers had made 13 times the amount of local effort made by the voluntary subscribers, and yet the grant which the former were to receive was only one-fourth of that awarded to the latter. The Government had dealt with this question in a light and airy fashion. They had not attempted to argue it out when the Bill was introduced, and no one had risen to justify the principle of the Bill that day, the Second Reading having been moved by a mere nod to the Chair. He held that the Bill was a scandal, having regard to the obvious duties of the Government towards elementary education. In no other country in the world would such a division be drawn between one class of schools and another: nowhere else would one class of schools be dealt with on the principle of rewarding them in inverse ratio to the amount of local efforts made to support them. This was a sham Bill; it did not proceed on the principle of recognising the poverty of districts. What it did was to award a very small amount of money to a very few districts which came within the operation of the Measure owing, as it were, to the accidents of assessment. He might be told that he ought not to find fault with the Bill, because his own county was rather favoured by it. But what was the real state of the case regarding Northamptonshire? The sum given would be only £1,549, and that would be given to School Boards which raised rates amounting to nearly £24,000. The subscriptions to Voluntary Schools amounted to £11,500, and the grant which they were to receive was £8,250. Thus the grant to the Voluntary Schools reached a percentage upon the subscriptions of 72, while the proportion of the Board Schools' grant to the rate would be only 8·6. That was to say, nine times more was to be given to the Voluntary Schools than to the Board Schools, and that would be the case in a county which was described as specially favoured. The whole policy of the Act of 1870 was based upon the principle of equality of treatment, and when the Debates of 1876 took place the same claim was put forward by the friends of national education, and up to the present time the principle of equality of treatment had been frankly and fully recognised, he might almost say, on both sides. He did not need to quote again the well-known reply of the Duke of Devonshire to the deputation that waited upon him on this question. The doctrine of the Tory Party on the subject of relieving the rates was peculiar. If a community agreed to rate itself for any other object than the education of its children, the ratepayers, according to the Party opposite, ought to be rewarded by the State, and grants flowed like water. But if the ratepayers determined to rate themselves for what was, perhaps, one of the highest objects of local self-government, namely, the education of the children in their district, they were apparently to be penalised, and to be substantially fined for the transgression. This Bill had already caused suspicion and dislike among large classes of those who were interested in this question. The right hon. Gentleman opposite must have read the discussions that took place the other day at the conference of the National Teachers at Swansea, when a Resolution demanding exactly what he now asked the House to sanction was passed with unanimity. The hon. Member for North West Ham had explained that he understood the Resolution as meaning that the Legislature ought to deal with all classes of schools on equal and fair lines, and ought to treat one class of local effort in the cause of education on the same principles as they applied to the other class. One set of schools were supported by contributions from the rates; the other set were supported by contributions from individuals and societies. Both sets ought to receive equal treatment, and the interests of the children ought to be kept in view as a vital principle. It was simply monstrous to talk of the bottomless purse of the ratepayers. The truth was that they soon got to the bottom of the generosity of the voluntary subscriber. Some hon. Members had expressed the opinion that the whole subject of the maintenance of elementary education should be transferred to the Exchequer. He wished most strongly to dissociate himself from any such view, for he did not think that the elementary education of this country could be carried on in a satisfactory way either in its educational aspect or in its economic aspect if they were to transfer to the Exchequer the local payments which were now made on a sense of local responsibility, which created a large amount of local interest and which naturally developed a great amount of local attention. Such a transfer would be a very grave mistake of policy. While he assented to the principle of the sliding scale, he regarded the present application as ludicrous. Under its application some 25 or 30 School Boards would receive the enormous sum of £1 each towards their expenditure. Would it not be farcical for the right hon. Gentleman to send that to a School Board, which, of course, that sum would not benefit in the least? He wanted to get rid of these small Boards altogether. Education ought to be organised in a broad spirit, and there ought to be large representative authorities in a county, which could be intrusted, not with miserable little sums, but with large and substantial amounts, so that excellence might be obtained, and the best educational equipment provided over a considerable area. This was a pettifogging Bill, and he wished, in moving his Amendment, to protest not only against the Bill as wholly inadequate and wholly defective in machinery, but also against the spirit which underlay this whole class of legislation—the spirit of pushing under one class of schools as much as possible, while treating the other class with as much consideration as was possible. That principle was wholly wrong and absolutely contrary to the common sense view taken by all great nations on the question of education. He demanded in his Amendment that this question should be adequately dealt with on the principle of fairness to all sides, and in a comprehensive spirit which would assign a large sum to the Education Department to distribute in all centres where aid was specially required. On these grounds he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name. [" Hear, hear! "]

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.), in seconding the Amendment, said that the question before the House was whether the proposal of the Government was fair to the Board Schools. In the preceding Bill a certain class of schools and a certain class of ratepayers received from the Government £620,000 a year, while under this Bill the Board Schools were to receive only £110,000. This was but a very small proportion to the total amount raised in rates throughout the country, which last year reached to more than £2,000,000. The relief given to the ratepayers under this Bill would amount to hardly 5 per cent. on the amount of the rates, whereas the relief given to Voluntary Schools would reach the large proportion of 75 per cent. of the amount contributed by voluntary subscribers. The average rate raised for Board Schools throughout the country at the present time was 9d. in the pound, and the meaning of the financial proposals of the Bill was that in future the ratepayers would have to subscribe towards their schools, not 9d. in the pound, but 8½d. The number of schools that would be affected by the Bill was comparatively small—out of 5,316 School Boards only 794 were dealt with by the Bill. Taking first the county boroughs, a large number of them would get nothing under the Bill. Birmingham, for instance, where 48,276 children were being educated in Board Schools as against 24,396 in denominational schools, would get nothing under the Bill, although the rate was a fairly high one. The case of Liverpool was the same, and Nottingham with 25,110 children being educated in Board Schools, and with a rate of 15d. in the pound, would not get a penny. Coming next to urban districts with a population of over 20,000, he found that in the County of Middlesex only one such district—namely Tottenham—would receive anything under the Bill, and in Kent and Lancashire not one. Darlington, where 3,543 children were being educated, and where the rate was 10d. in the pound; Acton, with 3,019 children and a rate of 10d.; and Hornsey, with 4,971 children and a rate of 11d., would all receive nothing. But there was another injustice or anomaly in the operation of the Bill. The rate in Workington was 9½d., and the School Board there would receive 5s. 7d. per child in average attendance, whereas in Stockton, with a rate of 9¾d., the School Board would get only 1s. per child. The main objections were taken on that side of the House to the Bill. First, that the grant was totally inadequate, and secondly, that in the distribution of the grant the Bill would work unfairly and unequally. The exceptional position of Wales deepened the injustice of the Bill. The dominating principle in the proposals of the Government was that there should be some connection between the rateable value of a district and the number of the children in the schools; but that principle would not be carried out when the Bill came into actual operation. The School Boards in Wales and Monmouthshire under the Bill would receive approximately £22,000. At present, under the Bill of 1870, they were entitled to the sum of £30,373, so that the real money benefit to Wales and Monmouthshire would be £15,000. The amount raised by the rates in Wales and Monmouthshire was about £114,000, so that the relief given would not amount to more than 15 per cent. of the amount raised. The 5s. grant under the Voluntary Schools Act for Wales and Monmouthshire reached in round figures £25,000. The subscriptions towards Voluntary Schools came to about £35,000. Therefore the relief given to these voluntary subscribers would be at the rate of 70 per cent. In Anglesey there were 31 School Boards, but eight only would be affected by the Bill. The ratepayers contributed to the School Boards £3,792, and they would receive £95 10s., from which sum about £25—which they were already entitled to under the Act of 1870—was to be deducted. In Carnarvonshire there were 60 School Boards, but 13 only would be affected. The ratepayers contributed £8,000, and they would receive £1,560. They were already entitled to £620, so that the nett relief would be £758 only. The case of Flintshire was still worse. There were there five School Boards, and only one would receive aid. The local School Board rates amounted to £4,560, but the ratepayers were only to receive the miserable pittance of £140. Under the Voluntary Schools Act, however, the denominational schools received £2,404 per annum. In Merionethshire there were 19 School Boards, but only eight got relief. The ratepayers contributed £9,369, and they would get £867. In Montgomeryshire there were 15 School Boards, but only two got any relief. The ratepayers contributed £2,864, and they got £29. In Denbighshire the case was almost as bad. There were 28 School Boards, but five only got any grant. The ratepayers raised every year for the schools £10,000, but they would get £500 only. The subscribers to denominational schools contributed over £3,038, but they got £2,076. Not only was the grant under the Bill totally inadequate, but the sliding scale would work very unfairly as between Board School and Board School. For instance, the heaviest rated School Board in Denbighshire, whose rate was 1s. 5½d. in the £, got the least under the Bill—namely, £43; while the School Board whose rate was the lightest—10¾d.—got the most, namely, £314. Summarising the case as regarded North Wales, there were in that district 158 School Boards, only 37 of which would receive any relief at all. The ratepayers contributed towards their Board Schools over £38,000, and they would receive under the Bill £2,360 only. They would thus be relieved to the extent of 7 per cent., while the Voluntary Schools had been relieved to the extent of over 70 per cent. Because he regarded the grant given by the Bill as totally inadequate for the purpose which the Government had in view, and because the sliding scale as now drawn would undoubtedly operate unfairly as between School Board and School Board, he had much pleasure in seconding the Amendment.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) thought the House could hardly help feeling that the very important question raised by the Bill had been discussed by the two hon. Members who had just spoken in reference to minute details rather than general principles. His hon. Friend who moved the Amendment complained very much because Lancashire was not fairly dealt with by the Bill, and he thought the Leader of the House would have great difficulty in meeting his constituents, considering how very little relief would be given to Lancashire. But they all remembered that a little while ago, when the Voluntary Schools Bill was before the House, the accusation brought against the Government was that Lancashire received a great deal too much, and that the constituents of the Leader of the House were being bribed by the large amount received under that Bill. The line taken by the Opposition generally did not seem to be at all consistent with the principles which they had advocated when other Measures had been before the House. He understood that this Bill would not be opposed by hon. Gentlemen opposite. They did not, however, manifest any great gratitude for it. They seemed "willing to wound, yet afraid to strike." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton indeed said that he would welcome any proposal to grant money from the Imperial Exchequer in aid of rates. He was sorry to hear his right hon. Friend say so. That used to be the special view of the Tory Party. Sir Massey Lopes year after year brought forward Motions in that sense, and they were resisted by the great majority of the Liberals on the ground that such grants tended to weaken economy, and to encourage additional expenditure; that they took a guinea out of one pocket to put a sovereign into the other. The experience of recent years went far to confirm the truth of that opinion. They had heard much about the "bottomless purse" of the ratepayers, and it was certainly no use pouring money into a "bottomless purse." Our taxation had increased, and our rates had risen also. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had more than once pointed out, and with great force, the inconsistency of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who denounced the Agricultural Rating Bill of last year, because they said that any relief of rates on land went into the pockets of the landlords, and now complained of this Bill because it did not do enough to relieve the ratepayers in large towns. If the Government brought in a Bill to relieve the rates, right hon. Gentlemen condemned it as a Bill in relief of landlords, on the ground that rates fell on the landlords. If a Bill were brought in to help necessitous schools, they were told that rates fell on occupiers, and that the Government were doing nothing, or very little, to assist the overburdened ratepayers. As he understood, this apparent contradiction was justified by the allegation that the incidence of rates in town and country was quite different; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had told them that the First Lord of the Admiralty in his standard work on local taxation had clearly pointed out the difference between the incidence of rate on different classes of property. The right hon. Gentleman had kindly referred him to the passages on which he relied, but they scarcely seemed to him to bear out the interpretation put on them. No doubt the subject was very complex and there were many differences, but as regarded land, he understood the contention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to have been that most land was held on yearly tenancies, and somewhat below its value, so that in agricultural districts the tendency had been "to throw by far the greater part of the rates upon the tenants." On the other hand, when there were leases, he said that > "both in the case of land and houses, where a fresh agreement is to be made with the owner of the soil, the whole of the existing rates comes out of the pocket of the landlord in the shape of a diminished rent; neither the farmer nor the builder knowingly or willingly intends any portion to come out of his own pocket; if it does, it is because he has miscalculated the future."

Passing to the case of towns, did he say that rates were ultimately paid by the occupiers? Not at all. When ground-rents were high he said, "It is almost certain that rates affect the ground landlord alone," and he added:—

> "To sum up the case of house property generally, it appears that the owners of building land, like the owners of other land, have to submit to a reduction of rent equivalent to the average amount of rates which the builder or other lessee calculates that he would have to pay according to the average of past rates."

He could not think, therefore, that the First Lord of the Admiralty would agree to the interpretation placed upon his words by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. However that might be, he must say that in the long run, and speaking in the great majority of cases, he believed that the rates in towns as well as in the country districts fell ultimately upon the owner of the land. Of course, where land was let below its real value, either in towns or country, that did not apply; but in towns that was not often the case. He confessed, therefore, under these circumstances that he had some difficulty in understanding the application which was now made of the term "necessitous School Boards." Hon. Gentlemen opposite complained that by the recent legislation of the Government the towns were placed in an unfair position. Wolverhampton, for instance, and West Ham had been specially referred to. But let the House take the case of two men who invested money, the one in land and the other in Wolverhampton or one of our great cities. In the first case the value of the investment as a rule had considerably fallen, in the other it had largely risen; and yet they were told that they ought to impose taxation which fell upon all classes of the community in order to help those whose property had most risen. Take, again, the case of West Ham. Suppose two men who invested money, one in land down in Essex, the other in West Ham. He admitted that rates were very high in West Ham, and should not grudge some present assistance. It was quite true that the rates in West Ham were very high; but whereas the investment of the man who purchased land in West Ham had greatly increased in value, on the other hand the unfortunate purchaser of land down in Essex found that much of his property was now derelict and almost valueless; and yet they were told that they should tax them in order to help their much more fortunate neighbours. Of course, in making these remarks he was speaking of a permanent contribution. It was undeniable that in West Ham the rates had largely risen of late years, and for some temporary assistance therefore there was no doubt very much to be said. He believed that in London there would be a feeling that they had some cause to complain of the manner in which they had been recently treated, not especially by the present Government, but by those also who had preceded them. It might be quite true that London was, as a whole, a rich place, but there were very poor districts in London; and London would, he thought, consider that it had some reason to complain that they should receive so little benefit from the Voluntary Schools Bill and none at all from the present Measure. He admitted, however, the difficulty in the case of London, and a Committee was sitting on the whole question. He trusted that the result would be to do justice to London, but so far as the present Bill was concerned he regarded this Bill as an honest proposal on the part of the Government to carry out their pledge as regarded Board Schools.

Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I do not propose to follow my right hon. Friend into the very dry subject of the incidence of rating. I have too often bored the House upon that question to bore it again to-night. I can only say that I trust he will take occasion to repeat his views when the First Lord of the Admiralty is here, and I shall rejoice in the duel between two such authorities on this question about which we are all so much perplexed. I am glad to think that in my right hon. Friend's opinion London has a case, and if he can persuade the Government to amend the Bill to meet the case of London he will have from this side all the support he desires. I desire to say a word or two upon the source and origin of this Bill, and shall endeavour to submit to the House that the present modification of the 3d. rate and the present modification of 7s. 6d. is not at all in harmony with the Act of 1870, does not carry out its spirit, and instead of meeting the state of facts with which that Act was intended to grapple, it aggravates the situation all round and makes it much worse. When Mr. Forster introduced his Bill in 1870 he called attention to the question of the burden which would be cast upon the ratepayer, and the figures he proceeded upon were these. He put the cost of education at that time at £1 7s. 6d. per head, of which the Government grant represented 9s. 7d., the subscriptions 7s. 3d., and the parents' fees were something between 8s. and 9s. Mr. Forster had to ask the House of Commons to consider what the probable future cost of education would be, and he then told the House that, in his judgment, the rate would not exceed 3d. in the pound. Mr. Forster never departed from that estimate. His intention was that 3d. should be the maximum, and that if there was anything beyond 3d. then that the State—that is, the Consolidated Fund—should be called in aid of the local rate, and that no further burden should be imposed on the ratepayer. Clause 84, as it originally stood in the Bill of 1870, showed that Mr. Forster's opinion then was that the extreme cost which ought to fall upon the local authority should not be more than 10s. per child, and that if that figure were exceeded the State should make up the difference. That Bill was not, like the Education Bill of this Session, run rapidly through the House. [Cheers.] The country was allowed a long interval for its consideration between its Second Reading and its Committee stage. The Bill was introduced in February, and in June, when it came on again there was a crisis, for, as those who have read the life of Mr. Forster will know, the Cabinet was not quite united as to the best course to be pursued. In June, Mr. Gladstone, who was then First Lord of the Treasury, proposed that, having regard to the burdens thrown both upon the local authorities and the voluntary subscribers, the State grant should be increased to 50 per cent. of the whole cost of education—the additional grant to be given to both rated and Voluntary Schools alike—and in proposing that change Mr. Gladstone said that the relief it would give to the rates would be so considerable that the School Board rate would never come to 3d. in the pound. Again, when in Committee on the Bill, an Amendment was moved that the School Board rate should not exceed one penny in the pound, and that all the rest of the cost of education should be paid out of the Imperial funds, Mr. Forster declared it was not probable that any charge for the purposes of the Bill would exceed a rate of 3d. in the pound. Accordingly 7s. 6d. per child was substituted for 10s. per child in Clause 84 of the Bill. All this showed that the whole Clause was based upon the principle that the School Board rate was not to exceed 3d. in the pound. The Government now propose to alter this scheme. They still adhere to the 3d. in the pound, and they still adhere to the 7s. 6d. in the way of making them the basis of their calculation, but they do not accept the 7s. 6d. per child as the limit of local taxation beyond which the cost of education should be paid by the State. Mr. Forster said in 1870 that 30s. per year—made up of local rates, school fees, and Government grants—was too high a figure at which to place the cost of educating each child. He then expressed the belief that the real cost was 25s. 7d. Well, the cost has about doubled since then. In Voluntary Schools it is £2, and in Board Schools £2 10s. per child per annum. The Government grant, which was then something over 9s., is now double. Therefore the Government grant has increased in proportion to the cost. The cost of education since 1870 has doubled; the Government grant has doubled; but the local burden has remained stationary. The Government have declared that, so far as the Voluntary Schools were concerned, they are entitled to an additional grant, and under the Act of this Session they have increased that grant by 5s. I am not going to discuss that Act at all. I am dealing with this Bill as carrying out the avowed policy of 1870, upon which that Act was based, that there should be a limit fixed, having regard to the cost of education, beyond which the tax upon the local ratepayer should not be increased. Mr. Forster said more than once, "We cannot go into the question of the incidence of taxation." The defect of rates then was that they did not fall fairly on all classes of property. The complaint of that day is the complaint which is made to-day. An inquiry was promised into the question of the incidence of taxation 25 years ago, but it has not been carried out, and I am very sceptical whether it will be carried out. We ought to legislate on the basis that rates as levied now are not levied fairly on all classes of the community, and it is within your right to increase the burden of those rates beyond a certain figure if for a certain purpose the State requires the locality to discharge certain duties. But the principle of the Act of 1870 was that the State was to give aid by a very considerable contribution after a certain amount of that figure had been contributed. What is the rate to-day? I am quite willing to say that regard should be had to the increased cost of education, the increased grant, and the different circumstances; what was right to fix as a rate limit in 1870 would not be right to fix in 1897. Suppose you doubled the rate, and said that 6d. should be the rate instead of 3d., it would be a true proportion according to the present cost of education. My hon. Friend told you that in the case of 1,500 of the principal School Boards of England the rate exceeds 6d. in the pound. The Government admit the grievance, and they propose to meet it by this Bill. But whatever I may say in support of the Amendment of my hon. Friend behind me as to the injustice which we have already discussed as between Board Schools and Voluntary Schools, I think the injustice inside this Bill is far greater than even the initial injustice as between the two classes of schools. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not impute for a moment to the right hon. Gentleman opposite or the Government any intention to commit an injustice; but they have adopted a scheme and a sliding scale which are inevitably bound to work unjustly, and which I will defy them to adapt to any principle that can work satisfactorily or fairly. I must trouble the House with a few figures on this question. I will deal with what the School Boards inside this Bill are going to get, and show the gross and unparalleled injustice of this scheme. I see my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin opposite, so I will take a few of the School Boards in Cornwall which are going to be relieved under this Bill, and having shown the differences between them, I will ask the Government to state on what principle they defend them. In St. Agnes the school rate is 7d. in the pound, and it is to get 4s. 10d. for every child in the Board School. St. Austell pays a rate of 10¾d., and it is to get only 2s. 2d. St. Endellion pays a rate of 10¼d., and is to get 4s. 4d. St. Just in Penwith pays a rate of 14d., and is to get 7s. 7d.; while St. Just in Roseland, with a rate of 21d., is to get 7s. 6d. St. Teath pays a rate of 14d., and is to get only 3s. 11d. I will leave the right hon. Member for Bodmin to explain to his constituents the financial justice and equity of this scheme. In the County of Derby, the borough of Chesterfield pays a rate of 1s., and is to get 3s. 1d.; Hartington, with a rate of 1s. 2¼d., is to get only 2s. 11d.; Ilkeston pays a rate of 10d., and is to get 4s.; Osmaston pays a rate of 1s. 4d., and is to get 6s. 8d.; Pinxton pays a rate of 1s. 1d., and is to get 6s. 9d. In the county of Devon, Bideford pays a rate of 11d., and is to get 4s. 1d.; Buckfastleigh pays a rate of 11¼d., and is to get 4s. 2d.; the borough of Devonport pays a rate of 1s., and is to get only 4d.; while Kingswear, which also pays a rate of 1s., gets 5s. 10d. In the county of Durham, Crook pays a rate of 1s., and is to get 5s. 7d.; the borough of Gateshead pays a rate of 10d., and is to get 3s. 8d.; whereas the borough of West Hartlepool pays a rate of 1s. 0¼d., and is to get 3s. 4d. The anomalies are astounding in Essex, in Gloucester, and in Kent. In the latter county, Dartford pays a rate of 1s. 3¼d., and is to get only 7d.; while Burham, which only pays a rate of 8d., is to get 3s. 10d. In the county of Lancaster, the borough of Barrow-in-Furness pays a rate of 1s. 0¼d., and is to get 7d.; while Shevington, with a rate of 10d., is to get 5s. 4d. In the county of Leicester, the borough of Loughborough pays a rate of 10¼d., and is to get only 1s. 3d. In Lincoln, the borough of Grimsby, with a rate of 9¼d., is to get only 4d. I might take many other counties, but I will take my own county of Staffordshire, where the differences are really amusing, as well as startling. In Willenhall the rate is 11d., and they are to get 4s. 1d. I am very pleased that my constituents there will receive that sum. That is a purely manufacturing neighbourhood. But there is another place in the county, Burslem, which is of precisely the same character, and where precisely the same conditions obtain, and which, although the rate is the same, 11d., is to get only 2s. 4d. I should like to hear why this anomaly should exist. Rushall, with a rate of 10d., is to get 6s. There are two Nortons in Staffordshire, each with a rate of 1s., but one is to get 4s. 1d. and the other 3s. 4d. In Warwickshire, Aston, which is really a part of Birmingham, is to get 2s. 6d. per head, while Birmingham gets nothing. In Worcestershire there are some astounding discrepancies. Kidderminster, with a rate of 1s. 1d., is to get only 1d., while Dudley, with a rate of 8¼d., is to get 8d. Wollscote, again, with a rate of 4¾d., is to get 5s. 3d. The county of York bristles with these inequalities, and they are to be found all through the Bill. I ventured to call the other Bill discriminating injustice; I call this Bill indiscriminating injustice. I put it to the House that it is impossible to defend this scheme upon the principle of Mr. Forster's Act of 1870, and it is impossible to defend the extraordinary operation of this sliding scale. The startling contrasts which I have given are inherent in an attempt to apportion this relief according to the rate raised in various localities, because the diversity of the rating areas prevents it. Our rating areas are as great a chaos as are our rates. There are circumstances involving the amount of rate raised, such as the poverty or wealth of the locality, or the character of its occupants. If you had even taken the whole county, you might have had less injustice in this Bill. The only method by which you can ever arrive at a settlement of this question is by treating the schools, whether Voluntary or School Board, equally all round —[cheers]—as all previous legislation with reference to public grants has done. You cannot adjust the matter by the rates; you cannot institute an inquisitorial inquiry as to what locality is rich or poor, or what school ought or ought not to be benefited. Your principle should be to treat all alike, and to give to every one the same. I think a very inadequate amount is given to School Boards. In a year when the Exchequer is overflowing, as, perhaps, it has never overflowed before, I think it would have been worthy of the House of Commons and of the Government to have treated Board Schools with a generous liberality, and not to see how far they could screw them down. I think the sum given ought not to have been less than that given to the Voluntary Schools, and if the Government had chosen to give both classes of schools more, perhaps, it would have been wiser, and such action would have been more likely to obtain a final settlement than anything we have had yet. If you give one Board School 5s., give it to another. Your own limit is wrong as to what is a necessitous school within that limit. Distribute equally within that limit, and I think you should distribute outside that limit. Take a new limit, and instead of 3d. some other figure, and treat all schools exactly alike, totally irrespective of the richness or poverty of the district in which the school may be situated. [Cheers.]

Mr. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.), replying to the speech of the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton, said an argument sought to be based on the prediction of 1870, that 3d. in the pound would suffice for the education rate throughout the country, carried almost its own refutation. The right hon. Gentleman said he wanted equality of treatment. But surely it was not treating Board and Voluntary Schools equally that the latter should have £618,000 under the Voluntary Schools Bill of the present year, and that the Imperial Exchequer should be used in aid of Board Schools where the rate was in excess of 6d. in the pound. What the advocates of Voluntary Schools wanted, and what they had never had and were not getting under this Bill, was equal treatment all round. Any system such as the right hon. Gentleman suggested—that the Imperial Exchequer should be drawn upon to aid all School Boards where the rate was in excess of 6d. in the pound—would not only perpetuate, but aggravate the existing inequalities. Hon. Members opposite challenged London Members to defend the Bill in the face of the scandal and grave injustice, as they called it, to which London was subjected under the Bill. The hon. Member for West Islington showed some sense of conscience. He had been so strenuous in his efforts to divert to England and London a great portion of the expenditure which should properly be defrayed by Ireland that he offered them a litle sop in aid where they were entitled to no relief whatever.

Mr. LOUGH asked if the hon. Member could mention any instance of any such sum being diverted to England that should have been paid by Ireland.

Mr. COHEN replied that, if it were relevant, he could go into the figures; but he understood that during the Debate on the financial relations between England and Ireland the hon. Member said two-and-a-half millions now being paid by Ireland should be paid by England.

Mr. LOUGH: The Royal Commission on the Financial Relations said so, not me. How ridiculous!

Mr. COHEN, resuming, said it was urged by hon. Members opposite that the Government were dealing with this great educational question piecemeal, and that this Bill was not final. A more unreasonable and inconsistent charge could not be made. It was truly said that the Bill of last year attempted too much. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken said it would revolutionise our system of elementary education; others said that system would be undermined. This year we had two Bills, joint Bills, not so ambitious as the one Bill of last year, and the Government were reproached for dealing with the question piecemeal. The reproach was due to misapprehension of the purpose of the Bill now under discussion. It did not vary the system on which elementary education was conducted either in Board or Voluntary Schools, but simply gave aid to necessitous School Board Schools which, because of their need, were in a condition of inefficiency and perhaps decay, or in peril of falling out of existence altogether. He did not think any of the anomalies repeatedly referred to by hon. Members opposite were relevant to this Bill, because they did not touch the principle on which the Bill was framed. Hon. Gentlemen seemed to forget that the needs and necessities of Board Schools in certain places did not depend exclusively or even mainly upon the School Board rate which happened to be levied in those places, but on the amount which would be realised by the raising of 1d. in the pound. That was the principle on which the Bill was framed, and which guided its awards and appropriations. Even that must and did work some injustice in certain cases, but the principle was as nearly perfect as any principle of the kind could be. No one had been louder in his praise of aiding necessitous Board Schools than the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, who now advocated equal treatment all round.

Sir H. FOWLER said that what he said was that it was impossible in dealing with expenditure like school grants to exactly ascertain the respective needs of each locality, and that the only workable principle was to give to each school an equal sum according to the needs of the children in attendance.

Mr. COHEN remarked that he did not know whether that was possible, but the Bill made an attempt (to a great extent successful) to reduce inequalities and aid districts which, by the amount that 1d. in the pound would produce, proved to be necessitous. He agreed that London was hardly treated by getting no grant under the Bill, but as a London Member he could not seek redress for one injustice by inflicting another on another part of the country. He admitted that the Agricultural Rates Bill of last year, instead of diminishing an injustice, accentuated it. [Opposition cheers.] But he supported the Bill, believing it was a necessary and just measure. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Shoreditch was a member of that Commission before whom the London Members would argue the case and establish the injustice. But he would not, because they suffered an injustice in London, on that account support a claim for London for which not a shred of foundation could be established. If London had a claim, the method which hon. Gentlemen opposite would resort to would give them little or no benefit. If they were to give the whole of the £110,000 to the metropolis it would make practically no difference to the School Board rate. The only way to reduce the School Board rate of London was to reduce the School Board expenditure. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not say that the expenditure was excessive, nor did he ask that it should be diminished, but he did say that it was oppressive. Even if they were to give £20,000 or £30,000 out of this grant to London instead of going in relief of the rates, it would be applied to increase the expenditure—perhaps the necessary expenditure—and to cause education which was intended to be primary to become still more secondary. It was intended by the Act of 1870 and by the subsequent Free Education Act that the education given in Board Schools should be primary and not secondary, and the way to reduce the School Board rate of London was to divide more sharply and rigidly than was now the case the line which separated primary and secondary education. He did not complain of the education that was given in the Board Schools, and was not prepared to assert that it was extravagantly administered; but contended that if they were to give an education so much in advance of that which was intended by the Act of 1870 and the Free Education Act, then it was scarcely straightforward of hon. Members opposite to complain of the cost which that education necessarily involved. ["Hear, hear!"] He supported the Bill because he believed it was framed on a right principle. It recognised the necessities of their School Boards, and gave them relief in proportion to their needs. He was convinced that the grant proposed by the Bill was equitable and proportionate. It could not be equitable unless it was proportionate. The object of this Bill and the Voluntary Schools Act was to give aid on an equitable and a proportionate principle to those schools which were in want of pecuniary support. To help those which were not in need would be to perpetuate and not to remove the inequalities that admittedly now existed. He believed this Bill would materially contribute to, if it did not entirely accomplish that object; and, at any rate, it was a faithful fulfilment of the pledge given by the Government, and by all their supporters, before the last General Election. He thanked the Government for having brought in the Bill, which he hoped would be speedily passed into law.

Mr. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester) remarked that until the speech which had just been delivered, he regarded this Bill as one of the most difficult subjects to thoroughly understand. That notion, however, had beeen put altogether on one side by the extraordinary speech of the hon. Member for Islington, who had declared that the way to lessen the educational burdens upon the ratepayers of London was to cut down the rates. The hon. Member said he was against lowering the educational standard of the metropolis, and then he went on to explain, by some curious process with which he did not seem to be quite satisfied himself, why he was supporting a Bill which gave no relief to his own constituents—a portion of the metropolis—the metropolis itself having a claim equal, to say the least of it, to any other educational authority in the United Kingdom. The hon. Member would find it much easier to make his explanation to that House than he would find it to meet his constituents in this matter. London ratepayers would want to know from their Members why it was they supported a Measure for the relief of Board Schools which did not give a single penny to the poor Board Schools of the metropolis. This Bill was intended as a sop. The Government obtained the support of many of the borough Members to the Church Schools Bill by the pledge that they would do something for the School Boards, but while they had given over £600,000 to the Voluntary, which were mainly Church of England, Schools, they only proposed to give £110,000 to the struggling Board Schools, and that in the most irregular manner imaginable. For instance, the School Board to which he was a ratepayer did not get a farthing, although, owing to the very high assessment of the parish, the rates were exceedingly heavy. It had been shown by speaker after speaker that the machinery of the Bill produced great injustice in various parts of the country, and he hoped the Vice President would insist upon a larger and better scheme. He supported the Amendment—which he hoped would be pressed to a Division—because it said that equality should be dealt out to both classes of schools, and that the Board School was as much entitled to 5s. per head all round as was the Voluntary School. He was bound to acknowledge that although the assistance given by the Bill was given in an inefficient, partial, irregular, and haphazard manner, his constituency would receive over £3,000 in the first year. But there was to be a process of reduction each year, and it seemed to him that by the extraordinary machinery provided it was possible for them to reach the vanishing point. If the Government, with their overflowing coffers and their enormous revenue, unexampled in the history of their country, had had the moral courage to devote a portion of the great surplus they would have to dealing out equal treatment to all classes of schools, their action would have been met with a universal shout of approval, and they would have received probably as united a support from the Opposition as from their own followers. Money was lavishly thrown away on naval and military matters, but when they came to the question of a sound education for every child in the land—one of the most important factors in their competition with foreign countries—they became parsimonious and mean. Educated Germans were their great competitors in London to-day, and yet they had a milk and water suggestion from the Member for East Islington that the educational standard of London should be lowered. He was surprised to hear the noble Lord the Member for Rochester cheer a backward policy of that kind.

Viscount CRANBORNE (Rochester): I cheered a proposal to lower the expenditure, not the standard of education.

Mr. BROADHURST said he should like the noble Lord to explain how the cost of education was to be lowered without lowering the standard of education. He wanted to know how the Government were going to defend their treatment of School Boards as compared with their treatment of Voluntary Schools. Of course, if they adopted the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton and provided £500,000 out of the Budget, so as to make the relief of the two classes of schools equal, they would remove the greatest cause of complaint against the present Measure; and if the Government made sure that all Boards got a fair share of the grant they would do much to facilitate its passage through the House.

Mr. C. A. CRIPPS (Gloucestershire, Stroud) thought the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton was somewhat inaccurate in his analysis of the provisions of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Bill proposed an alteration in the 3d. and in the sum of 7s. 6d. The only change made had reference, not to the 3d., but to the 7s. 6d. Under the Bill a sliding scale was provided by which that sum of 7s. 6d. might be altered according to the amount in the pound which was paid in various districts towards School Board expenses.

When the right hon. Gentleman realised that he would see that what the Government were now proposing was not an alteration of the policy laid down by Mr. Forster in 1870, but a carrying out of that policy in connection with new conditions so as to bring about somewhat the same results that were brought about by the very proposal which Mr. Forster himself introduced. The statistics prepared by the Education Department showed that the nominal produce of the 3d. rate per School Board scholar in average attendance varied according to the conditions of different localities. Therefore School Board districts under the scheme of Mr. Forster would have derived in some cases, although they were heavily taxed, no advantage at all; and in other cases a varying scale of advantage entirely dependent on the particular conditions of the particular locality to which that section might be applied. The basis of the Government scheme was exactly the same, although it was applied in a somewhat more artistic manner, and although the amount which might be given in School Board districts was proportionately, to a certain extent, increased. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite approved of the principle adopted by Mr. Forster in 1870 he would find merely an extension and improvement of the same principle in the provisions of the present Bill. It might be perfectly true that where they had a sliding scale of this kind they would have conditions of hardship, but the principle was right. It was not the actual rate paid, but it was the rate paid in reference to the burden which that rate threw on the ratepayers. That was the principle and basis on which the Government proposal was fixed. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1870 Mr. Forster put it forward as the first part of his argument that he desired to cover the country with good schools. The Government, in the Voluntary Schools Act and in the present Bill, were merely seeking to carry out what Mr. Forster put forward as the first plank in his educational programme. The difficulty had arisen because the standard of efficiency was very much higher now than it was in 1870, and, therefore, if they were to apply to the present standard of education the same principle as Mr. Forster applied in 1870, they must do it by giving a larger amount from Imperial resources. They could not do it in any other way. He did not think it would be possible to actually limit the amount of the School Board rate in the manner the right hon. Gentleman opposite had suggested, but he understood the right hon. Gentleman to agree with the general principle that the greater part of the funds for educational purposes should be supplied from the national Exchequer. The Government by this Bill were recognising the change of circumstances since Mr. Forster's time, and were leaving the burden for education as nearly as possible where Mr. Forster designed that it should be placed. If that was so the whole argument of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was in favour not only of the main part of the proposal, that the assistance should come from the National Exchequer, but also of the manner in which it was to be distributed—by the amendment of Section 97 of Mr. Forster's Act. They had heard a great deal about the principle of statutory equality. But up to this Session there had, in consequence of the operation of Section 97 of the Act of 1870, been statutory inequality in favour of poor School Board districts, and the Government by their legislation were seeking to secure equal treatment for both classes of schools. With regard to the incidence of rates, he maintained that they could not lay down any general principle in order to show whether the occupier who paid the rates in the first instance was the person who would get the benefit of any relief. In the long run the relief might go to the landlord. But that was not the question; in the first instance it would go to the occupier. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton had spoken of the inequality of the proposals of the Government as between Voluntary School districts and School Board districts. He submitted that the same principle which was typified in the word "necessitous" had been applied by the Government equally in both cases. Necessity meant either that an intolerable strain was put on those who had to provide the funds for education, or that the financial conditions were such that the education given was inefficient. The Government proposed to give relief from the National Exchequer in order that neither of these alternatives should come about, and they applied the same principle whether in the case of Voluntary School districts or of School Board districts. In this case, as in the case of the Voluntary Schools Bill, the policy of the Opposition was one of negation. If education was to be made efficient, and the overburdened ratepayers relieved in the poor School districts, the necessary funds could only come from one source, the National Exchequer. It was so that money given in this way was likely to be wasted. He had never heard one iota of evidence adduced in support of that view and believed it to be a mere chimera. Anyone who had studied the question must come to the conclusion that the system of subvention, which would have to be carried much further so far as education was concerned, had never led to extravagance, and that the increased local expenditure was due to the growth of the necessities of the districts. It was difficult to say how the Bill would operate in all cases; but, taking the two counties with which he was best acquainted, he found that both in Gloucestershire and in Buckinghamshire the relief would go where it was most needed. He was one of those who would like still more to have been done under a Bill of this kind in the way of relieving the ratepayer from the heavy burden of elementary education. But by their two Measures the Government had found nearly three-quarters of a million per annum in order to assist primary national education. That was a great boon from the proper source, a far greater boon than had ever been proposed by any Member on the opposite side of the House. The objection urged to the method in which the proposed relief was to be given was the current argument of the Opposition against Bills brought forward by the Government. But if they looked at the question from the wider point of view and agreed with the premise of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that relief should be given and that it could only come from the National Exchequer, he doubted whether any more equitable system could be found than that embodied in this Bill and in the Act dealing with Voluntary Schools. He hoped that most of the funds provided would be used for one purpose and one purpose only—for promoting and extending the efficiency of the national education of this country. [Cheers.]

*Mr. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) said that it would have been convenient for the House if the Minister of Education, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, had supplied information which was altogether wanting on its introduction. He had been plied with questions; he had been called upon to remove the ambiguities of the 97th Clause of the Act of 1870; and the Returns which had been produced by the Education Department had disclosed the fantastic and absurd inequalities which would result from the operation of the Bill. It could not be supposed that they were intended or anticipated by the Government; which might be credited with honesty of intention; but which had, he thought, sadly blundered. Did they mean to remove these anomalies, and to allow Amendments to be adopted, or was the Bill to be forced through the House as its predecessor had been? ["Hear, hear!"] It had been repeatedly said that the two Bills were financial, and not educational, Measures; but they were not even good financial Measures; for they would create the grossest inequalities and cause the utmost discontent in numerous localities. The two Bills would do little or nothing for the improvement of education; but would produce a new crop of educational anomalies and evils. What were the future prospects of education under the present Government? They might, perhaps, pass a Teachers' Pension Bill, and deal with Secondary Education, but as regarded elementary education, he suspected that the constructive power of the Government was now exhausted. This was certain, that nothing had been, or was likely to be, done by the Government to redress the grievances of Nonconformists in the 8,000 parishes in which there was only a Church of England school. The grievance had been frankly admitted by the Government; but they were no forwarder in the absence of measures of redress. He hoped that the Government's treatment of the subject of education would have the effect of bracing up not Free Churchmen only, but all real friends of educational progress, to enter at once on an agitation which would not cease until there existed an educational system which would be national in fact as well as in name.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Sir J. Gorst, Cambridge University): The House will probably expect me, before the Bill is Read a Second time, to make a few observations in regard to the criticisms from the opposite side of the House. Now, the hon. Member for Northampton, in moving the rejection of the Bill, has used over again the old arguments that there ought to have been similarity of treatment accorded to the Board and the Voluntary Schools. I hope he will not think me discourteous if I do not follow him again into these arguments. The Bill which has now become law is a Bill based avowedly on the principle of redressing the inequalities which exist between Board Schools in regard to their command of public funds by giving a larger share of the grant out of the Exchequer to the Voluntary and to the Board Schools. The question was very well argued on both sides—I took no part in the discussion and can speak the more impartially—[a laugh]—and the House, by an overwhelming majority, adopted the policy of the Government, and resolved that that principle should be carried out in legislation; and, therefore, I hope the hon. Member for Northampton will forgive me for treating it as res adjudicata. But the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton criticised the Bill in an entirely different spirit. He criticised it as a bad Bill on its own merits, and he gave us a very interesting and very accurate account of the intentions of the authors of the Act of 1870 in passing that clause which this Bill is intended to amend. He carried his description of the history of the clause up to a certain point, up to its embodiment in the Act of 1870, but he did not tell the House or impress upon the House what I think ought to be remembered—that the intentions with which the authors passed that section and the expectations they entertained of the operation of it were in every particular falsified. The section amounted to an engagement on the part of the Imperial Government that they would see the local authorities through at the cost of a rate of threepence in the pound. But the result of an experience of 25 years has shown not only that that could not be done, but that it was an impossible scheme. I do not wish to throw any blame on such persons as Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster, but we have the advantage now of 25 years' experience. They were talking of things which they expected and hoped for, but we have the advantage of knowing what has actually occurred, and the expectations they formed were in every respect falsified. So far from the threepenny rate seeing the local authorities through, the rate has gone up in some places to an enormous amount, and in most places far above threepence. The average rate throughout the country is ninepence, and, so far from the cost of education thrown on the local authorities being 7s. 6d. per child, it has gone up on an average of 20s. per child. So far, moreover, from the cost being uniform, it varies enormously in different parts of the country, and there is no kind of uniformity attending it. What the Government had to deal with in the Bill which they proposed was not the expectations of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster, but the actual working of the 97th Section of the Act of 1870 in the country. A great many of the injustices which the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton detailed are not the creation of this Bill amending that statute, but the creation of the statute itself. ["Hear, hear!"] Let me take one example—that of Aston and Birmingham. It is said:—"What a monstrous thing it is that under this Bill Birmingham will get nothing and Aston will get 2s. 6d. per child." But Aston is already getting under the existing law a sum of 1s. 10d. per child, so that a greater part of the injustice which so excited the reprobation of the right hon. Gentleman is in existence already. [Cheers.] The Bill merely increases the subsidy which Aston receives. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to tell me that the 97th Section of the Act of 1870 should be amended in accordance with the intentions with which the authors of the Act of 1870 passed that section? I think that a very little consideration would show the House that such an amendment as that is impossible. What would you have to do? You would have to substitute 9d. for 3d. and 21s. for 7s. 6d. Would the right hon. Gentleman recommend that the House should now enact that where a rate of 9d. in the pound did not produce a sum of 21s. per child the difference should be met out of the Exchequer? Such a proposal as that is practically impossible. In the first place an enormous number of School Boards which are now receiving assistance from the Consolidated Fund would have this assistance cut off. Aston, for example, is receiving assistance from the Consolidated Fund; would any one propose to cut off from the local authorities who are receiving that amount of aid the aid which they are receiving? There would be such an amount of opposition as would make the passage of such a Bill impossible. But that is not the only difficulty. The authors of the Act of 1870 did not seem to realise the great variety of the cost of education in different places. I do not know any practical scheme by which you could give the kind of relief they wish to give to local authorities, because, whereas in some places the 9d. rate is not more than sufficient to provide the necessary standard of education, there are other places in which the amount of 21s. is gross extravagance, and where no such amount as a 9d. rate would be rendered necessary. Therefore, on reflection, even the right hon. Gentleman will admit that, if the Government had attempted, not to amend the Act of 1870 as in operation, but to pass an entirely new section and to carry out the mistaken intentions which the authors of the Act of 1870 contemplated, they would have been embarking on a perfectly impossible course, and would have been quite unable to carry such a scheme. What the Government attempted to do was a very much more modest and simple proposal. They did not intend by this Bill to reverse the earlier Act of the Session, or to attempt to carry out the intentions of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster in 1870. All they have attempted to do, and all they profess they are doing, is to make the operation of the 97th Section of the Act of 1870 more just, more equitable, and to give better assistance to the School Boards which are in considerable danger. I must say that the examples which have been brought forward as to the operation of this sliding scale have really, if the whole of the facts of the case are known, proved the equity with which it would work. The first thing stated is that London is cut out of the Bill. Nothing of the kind is the fact. London is not in the 97th Section of the Act of 1870 now, because the rate of 3d. in the pound in London produces between 21s. and 22s. instead of 7s. 6d. I cannot conceive any extension of the Act of 1870 which would bring London under its operation, where the rateable value is so high compared with the number of children to be educated. London, therefore, is not cut out of the Bill; the Act has not been so amended as to bring London within it; and I do not think it could be amended to have this result. The hon. Member for West Islington contrasted the treatment of London with the treatment of West Ham and Tottenham and other poor districts in the neighbourhood. It is true that West Ham gets a large sum, and it is true that Tottenham gets a considerable sum under the education rate if this Bill becomes law in its present form, but the ratepayers of Tottenham and West Ham will pay a greater sum to the education of the children than the ratepayers of London. I have heard a great many reckless assertions made in the course of the Debate. The hon. Member for West Islington complained that Devon, which was a wealthy county, got more relief than Cornwall, a poor county. I have taken the trouble to have the amount calculated. I find, so far from this being the case, that Devon, with double the population of Cornwall, receives only £945 under the Bill, whereas Cornwall gets £2,711. [Cheers.] Then there is another illustration given which I think shows the extreme equity of the operation of the Bill. It is said that in Berkshire there are only two places which receive relief under the Bill. Each place has practically a rate of 9d., the same number of children in the schools, and it is said, "How monstrous that under the Bill one place should get £18 and the other only £8." But the hon. Member omitted to tell the House that in the one case the 3d. rate produces 7s. 11d. and in the other case 6s.; so that the operation of the monstrous injustice of the Bill will be to give both places the same amount per child out of the rate, combined with the assistance given. A contrast has been made between Huddersfield and Middlesbrough; but the hon. Member who made it did not tell the House that in Huddersfield the produce of the 3d. rate was 14s. 8d., while in Middlesbrough it was 8s. 3d., and Middlesbrough, being far more poor, gets more relief under the Bill than Huddersfield, which is the richer of the two places. Workington and Stockton-on-Tees were also mentioned as cases of differential treatment, but in Workington the 3d. rate is 4s. 6d. per child, while in Stockton it is 8s. 6d. Naturally, therefore, poor Workington gets a larger subsidy than Stockton. Attempts were also made to show that there are important places which do not get anything under the Bill, among the places being Liverpool. But in Liverpool the 3d. rate produces 27s. per child, or a sum greater than in London. Can anybody suggest any amendment which will bring a town like Liverpool, with a rate of only 3d. in the pound, producing 27s. per child, into the position of a town needing and receiving aid? I must point out that the purpose of this Bill is not a kind of prize-giving, as the hon. Member for Northampton seems to think. It is not intended that the Exchequer should give money to School Boards in proportion to the excellence of their schools and the good which they have done to the community. If that were the intention, you might well complain that towns like London and Liverpool and Manchester were left out. But there is no such intention. This is not a Bill to found prizes and rewards to local authorities for the way in which they have discharged their duties. It is a Bill to help those districts where the number of children to be educated bears an undue proportion to the rateable value, districts like West Ham, where there are many children and where the rateable value is low. The operation of the Bill, as far as can be foreseen from the rather rough statistics which we are able to lay before the House, will be in the opinion of the Committee of Council on Education to give assistance where it is most wanted. On the whole, they are very well satisfied with the apparent operation of the Measure. Before sitting down I must give the House one caution. This Return, which has been in everybody's hands, and which was prepared at the request of the right hon. Member for Rotherham, is necessarily a rough Return, and it is impossible for the Education Department to vouch for its accuracy. It is based upon financial statements, made by the clerks of School Boards, and the rate stated is sometimes the gross rate and sometimes the net, and we have no means of discriminating whether the rate given is the gross or the net rate. Therefore the localities mentioned in this Report must not reckon absolutely upon getting relief upon the figures given here. But when the amount to which each place is entitled comes to be estimated, of course accurate figures will be obtained, and the grant will be dispensed by the Committee of Council upon figures which are thoroughly trustworthy. I hope the House will now consent to Read the Bill a Second time. When the Committee stage is reached, if any hon. Members can suggest amendments under which the relief given can be made to operate in a more just manner, I can assure them that such amendments will receive most careful consideration. [Cheers.]

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) urged that the Opposition were entitled to protest against the inadequacy of the sum which was to be applied for relieving the strain upon the ratepayers. The strain in the case of the Voluntary Schools was much less severe, and yet they were to be assisted much more generously. This Bill was ludicrously inadequate to effect the object which it had in view, and the distribution of this small sum of money would not promote greater equality, but would create still greater anomalies and inequalities. The Vice President based the greater part of his case on the ground that he was making a very modest proposal to the House. It was because the proposal was so modest that they objected to it. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to what the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton had said respecting the motive which influenced those who introduced the Act of 1870, and particularly the intention of Clause 97, which the House was now asked to amend. What his right hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton had said was this, that they based their claim for a large grant on the ground that the prophecies, the ideas and intentions of the framers of the Act of 1870 had, after the stress of time, largely broken down. The First Lord of the Treasury had himself supported the increased grant for Voluntary Schools on the ground that the compromise of the Act of 1870 had broken down, and that in order to keep those schools in existence it was necessary to give them additional assistance. Surely, then, the Opposition were entitled to argue that if the Government intended to place the educational system of this country on a new and enlarged basis they ought not to be tied and bound by the language of the 97th Section, and ought to deal with the question according to some plan which would be fairer to the different sections of ratepayers. The arguments of the Vice President and other supporters of the Bill were based upon a fallacy. Over and over again it had been stated that because the rateable value of a particular district was low it was a poor district which ought to receive a comparatively larger amount of this education dole. But as a matter of fact it was not the poverty or wealth of a particular district which measured the strain and stress of the burden on the ratepayers in that district. In London, to take an instance, a rate of a shilling in the pound for educational purposes was just as great a burden upon the workers there as it was in any poorer district in the country. A rate of 11d. in London was as great a burden on the ratepayers of London as a similar rate was on ratepayers of any other part of the Kingdom. It was a fallacy to say that one could in any sense measure the strain and stress which was to be met by this Bill of the rateable value of any particular district. Whilst in London, for example, the rateable value was very high, not only because there was much wealth, but also because the assessment had been estimated at a very high rate, and was increased every five years, whilst that was the case in London, in many other districts the assessments and assessable value was put at a very low figure. The real way to estimate the education rate as an extra burden was by considering the weight of the total rate and the education rate in a particular district, and not merely by weighing an extra penny in the education rate. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the case of West Ham, and that undoubtedly was one of the cases in which there ought to be considerable relief. Would the hon. Member for North West Ham get up and say that his district would receive the amount of relief that it was entitled to? They must not take this Bill by itself. but must treat the two Bills of the Government as one whole, in order to ascertain what was the real relief given to a particular district. West Ham was perhaps the most necessitous of all the districts—in fact, this Bill had been called a West Ham and Walthamstow Relief Bill. But comparing the position of West Ham under the two Bills with the position of Preston, they found that the inequality of treatment was astoundingly great. The population of Preston was half that of West Ham, and its educational burden was one-tenth of that of West Ham, and yet the relief given in Preston would be £4,400, while in West Ham the relief given by this Bill, deducting what it received under the old 97th Section, would only be £10,600.

*Mr. ERNEST GRAY said that that figure was inaccurate. The sum which West Ham would receive under the two Bills would be much greater, about £20,000.

Mr. BUXTON said that the only basis for calculation available was the Return presented by the Vice President. The right hon. Gentleman, however, admitted that the statistics which it contained were inaccurate.

*Mr. GRAY said he was dealing with the total amount receivable under the two Bills.

Mr. BUXTON said he also was taking the two Bills together as a complete educational grant from the Government to necessitous Board Schools and necessitous Voluntary Schools. He was bound to say that he thought it was very unsatisfactory that the House should have to discuss a Bill of this kind in a hurry, when the right hon. Gentleman opposite himself said that his own return was largely inaccurate, and when they found a discrepancy between the figures of the right hon. Gentleman and the statement of the hon. Member below the Gangway. He wished to say a word with reference to the position of London. Taking the cases of London and Lancashire, and taking the two Bills together, he found that while in Lancashire, taking the Board Schools and Voluntary Schools together, the burden on the ratepayers and subscribers amounted to something like £400,000 a year, in London it amounted to over £1,500,000. When, therefore, the House came to consider the question of equality of burden, he could not see how it could be just or right that in the education policy of the Government, while the cost to the London ratepayers and subscribers amounted to more than four times the cost falling on the ratepayers and subscribers of Lancashire, the relief received in London should be only one-third of that received by the inhabitants of Lancashire. He thought it was obvious that however high might be the assessment in certain parts of London, when the poorer parts were considered, the burden of the education rate was far greater than it was in Lancashire. From his own point of view as a Member for one of the poorer districts of London, he considered that London was being very hardly treated by the Government. He would not treat London as a separate entity in any sense of the term if the Government had not treated these matters as matters of class and interest and locality; but he objected that under the Rating Bill of last year Londoners should have to pay £400,000 in order to give relief to the country districts, and that they should now be called upon to pay £120,000 to other parts of the country for what he did not believe would be any great step forward in educational progress, but would really lead to greater anomalies in the future, inasmuch as it was founded on great injustice as between the different classes of schools and the different classes of ratepayers. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) said he would be unable to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, though if the hon. Member had moved a direct negative to the Bill, he would have been able to give him his support. He considered that as the Bill stood it was a wrong to a large class of the ratepayers of the United Kingdom. This grant, though nominally a grant to the School Boards, was really a grant in relief of the ratepayers of certain districts. No doubt there were poor ratepayers in certain districts in Great Britain who were perhaps an object for the commiseration of the House, but in Ireland, which would have to find a portion of the money, the vast majority of the ratepayers were in the same positon as the small minority of the ratepayers of Great Britain, and thus the effect of the Bill would be to exaggerate enormously the fiscal injustice under which Ireland now laboured. This Bill must be taken in connection with the other Bills that had preceded it, and others that would doubtless come after. It could not be dissociated from the Agricultural Rating Bill of last year or from the Voluntary Schools Bill, which though an excellent Measure, was not, he believed, a just Measure, because it was not accompanied by a similar measure of justice to the Voluntary Schools of Ireland. And now this Bill was introduced without any proposal to afford similar relief to Scotland and Ireland, beyond some vague indication that the Government were contemplating proposals for the relief of Ireland. If he was told that there would be something of the same kind as the ridiculous Bill introduced the other night, all he could say was, that was not what Ireland wanted. The only way to give an equivalent to Ireland was to give similar relief to that given to England. He protested against the practice of giving large sums by way of relief to the wealthy and well-to-do ratepayers of England, while nothing was done for the poorer ratepayers of Ireland. He contended that if they went into the figures it would be found that the grant out of the Imperial funds for education in England was larger in proportion to the population than the grant from Imperial funds in Ireland. There were no means now of increasing the taxation in Ireland, and the plan was resorted to of making the Irish taxpayer bear a portion of the burden of education here in accordance with the wishes of the most selfish section of the English people. Although he should have to vote against the Amendment he protested against this plan of relieving the English ratepayer at the expense of the overburdened taxpayer in Ireland.

NAVY AND MARINES (WILLS) ACT (1865) AMENDMENT BILL.

On the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) thought there should be some explanation of the Bill by one of the Law Officers of the Crown. He found that the provision of the Act which the Bill proposed to amend dispensed with the usual qualifications necessary in a valid will in the case of a person serving as a seaman or of a person who had ceased so to serve. He could conceive an instance in which the repeal of those words might produce a great hardship.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) said the representatives of the Admiralty were not aware that the Bill would have come on so soon, and were therefore not present. But the point of the hon. Gentleman was a small one, and might very well be raised in Committee.

MR. PICKERSGILL said the point he had raised was the whole effect and substance of the Bill. In the circumstances he should move the adjournment of the Debate.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman's Motion is not seconded.

Bill read a Second time, and committed for Thursday.

VOLUNTEERS' BILL.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY to THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.) moved the Second Reading of this Bill. The object of the Measure was to provide that fines imposed on Volunteers who had undertaken to make themselves efficient and who had failed to fulfil their engagements, thereby putting their corps to expense which was not covered by capitation grants, should be recoverable in a court of summary jurisdiction. Hitherto it had been supposed that those fines were recoverable in a court of summary jurisdiction, but the Court of Appeal had decided that that was not the case, as the fines were civil debts, and the Bill only proposed to put the matter in the position it was supposed to have occupied before the decision of the Court of Appeal.

MR. PICKERSGILL said he objected to the Bill, because it increased the powers of magistrates to send persons to prison in default of paying fines. At present a defaulting Volunteer could not be sent to prison for the non-payment of the fines imposed on him unless those prosecuting could prove his ability to pay since the date of the Order. There were over 7,000 persons at present in prison, not for criminal offences, but in default of paying fines, and he objected to any extension of powers which would lead to an increase in that class of persons.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) said this was a question simply between the Volunteer corps and the individual, and not between the Volunteers and the nation. The Volunteer gave an undertaking that he would either do the service required of him or pay the equivalent of the capitation grant, which, however, he might earn by very small exertion on his own part. A man signed with an absolute knowledge of what he undertook, and it was in his power to carry out his undertaking. He pointed out that the Measure was a necessary and desirable one.

Bill read a Second Time, and committed for Thursday.

CIVIL SERVICES, 1897-8.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £238,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1898, for the Customs, Inland Revenue, Post Office, and Post Office Telegraph Buildings in Great Britain, including Furniture, Fuel and sundry Miscellaneous Services."

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £159,100 (including an additional sum of £1,100), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1898, in respect of sundry public buildings in Great Britain, not provided for on other Votes."

Resolutions agreed to.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid.) asked the First Commissioner of Works whether the fees at Holyrood could be abolished at once. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman had agreed that the fees should cease after this year. He did not see why any charge should be made at Holyrood, when in similar palaces in England no such charge was made. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would approach the Treasury with a view to seeing whether the charge could not be done away with now.

*THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's) said he was anxious that there should be similarity of treatment between the two countries in this respect. He had considered the matter, and as soon as it was possible the fee should be abolished. It was not quite so easy as the hon. Member thought. There was a negotiation with the Lord Provost and the Corporation of Edinburgh, which it would be necessary first to carry through. Moreover, if the charge were abolished at once a supplementary Estimate would be required, as it would be impossible to carry on the caretaking of the Palace unless they had the appropriation of these fees. As soon as he could make the necessary arrangements the fees should cease.

Resolution agreed to.

5. "That a sum, not exceeding £23,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the Houses of Parliament Buildings."

6. "That a sum, not exceeding £25,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the extension of the Admiralty Buildings."

7. "That a sum, not exceeding £39,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for expenditure in respect of miscellaneous legal buildings, viz., County Courts, Metropolitan Police Courts, and Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland."

8. "That a sum, not exceeding £16,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for expenditure in respect of Art and Science Buildings, Great Britain."

9. "That a sum, not exceeding £16,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for expenditure in respect of Diplomatic and Consular Buildings, and for the maintenance of certain cemeteries abroad."

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): To call attention to the Tenure and Ownership of Land in Towns; and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 25th May.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (OFFICIAL EXPENSES).

Mr. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): To call attention to the Election Expenses of candidates for Parliament; and to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the Official Expenses in connection with Parliamentary Elections should be a charge upon the Public Revenue."—[Tuesday, 25th May.]

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY (JUDICIAL DUTIES, EXPENSE).

Mr. A. HELDER (Whitehaven): To call attention to the expense incurred by the Incorporated Law Society in performing the Judicial Duties imposed upon it by 51 and 52 Vic., c. 65; and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 25th May.]

BRITISH TRADE WITH CANADA.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To move, "That this House desires to express its grateful and fraternal recognition to the Government and people of the Dominion of Canada of the generous and patriotic fiscal proposals in favour of British trade and labour announced on 23rd April in the House of Commons at Ottawa and already in force, and expresses its hope that similar action may commend itself to the wisdom of the people of Australasia, Canada, and other Colonies." ["Hear, hear!"]—[Tuesday, 25th May.]

QUESTIONS.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (SCOTTISH WATERS).

Mr. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, having regard to the fact that a large number of torpedo and picket boats are lying idle at Portsmouth and Chatham, he will place at the disposal of the Scottish Office one or more of these boats for service on the northern coasts of Scotland for the purpose of protecting the interests of the line fishermen against illegal trawlers?

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): No, Sir.

TRUSTEE AND POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state the total sum provided by the Government to make good deficiencies in connection with trustee savings banks since the passing of the Savings Bank Act?

The hon. Member also asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state the total profits on the Post Office Savings Bank since the foundation of that institution?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): The statement asked for by the hon. Member as to Trustee and Post Office Savings Banks cannot be conveniently given in the form of an answer to a Question. I would refer him to House of Commons Paper No. 75 of this Session and to the last Report of the Postmaster General, where he will, I think, find all the information he requires.

LIGHTHOUSE (TUIMPAN HEAD).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is now in a position to state when the construction of a lighthouse at Tuimpan Head will be commenced?

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. C. T. Ritchie, Croydon): The Board of Trade have now sanctioned the necessary expenditure for the construction of this lighthouse, and I am informed by the Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses that steps will at once be taken for the preparation of the required plans, etc., with a view to the early commencement of the work.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

SIR EDWARD GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he has concluded his arrangements for the purpose of enabling Members of both Houses of Parliament to witness the procession of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, intended to commemorate the sixtieth year of her reign; if so, will he be good enough to inform the House the nature of the arrangements; and whether any and what number of places will be allotted to Members in addition to their own?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The arrangements are concluded so far as I am concerned. Members of both Houses of Parliament will have one ticket free and two tickets for which 12s. 6d. each will be paid. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] Members of the House of Lords will have a stand set apart for them in front of the National Gallery. Members of the House of Commons will have allotted to them stands on Speaker's Green and in New Palace Yard.

MR. THOMAS B. CURRAN (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, when he is considering the accommodation for Members and officials of the House to view the Royal Procession on the 22nd of June, he will endeavour to find space for the members of the Press in the Lobby and Gallery of the House of Commons?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I hope it may be possible to make some provision of the nature indicated for members of the Press in attendance at the Houses of Parliament.

MR. T. B. CURRAN asked how many seats the right hon. Gentleman hoped to be able to place at the disposal of the Press Gallery?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: The hon. Gentleman must give me a little time to consider that question, but I hope to be able to provide ample accommodation.

MR. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked whether it was intended to erect any seats in St. James's Park?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: No, Sir; the only seats we propose to erect are those for the accommodation of the Members of the two Houses of Parliament and of certain Government officers.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Dundee (Sir JOHN LENG), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can now state what arrangements have been or are likely to be made for the representation of Crimean veterans in the Diamond Jubilee celebrations of Her Majesty's reign?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The military authorities have carefully considered the proposals to secure a representation of the veterans of the Army on 22nd June, and it is considered that they will be most fittingly represented by the pensioners of Chelsea Hospital, who number over 400, and are all men of long service, of whom the great majority have campaign records. A special position will be allotted to them to see the procession.

PIERS (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland has received a communication from the Lewis District Committee expressing deep regret that the promised grant for the construction of piers at Bayble and Valtos, Island of Lewis, has been withdrawn; whether he is aware that plans for these piers have been approved by the Board of Trade, and lodged within the specified time; that tenders have been advertised for; and that the people of the district have undertaken to give a large proportion of the cost of the piers in free labour; and whether, in view of these circumstances, he will arrange for the construction of these piers at an early date?

*MR. H. T. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews Burghs, for the LORD ADVOCATE): The Secretary for Scotland has received a communication from the Lewis District Committee, as stated by the hon. Member. He is substantially correct in what he says as to the proposed pier at Bayble, but the project for the one to be constructed at Valtos has not yet been entertained by the Secretary for Scotland, nor, so far as he is aware, have the plans been yet submitted to the Board of Trade, for the reason that the County Council has not yet given the guarantees always required in such cases. The Secretary for Scotland is not in a position to give a definite undertaking at present as regards the construction of these piers.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any, and, if so, what, reply has been received to the representations made by the Postmaster General on the subject of an improved Limited Mail Service from Dundalk to Cavan, Belturbet, and Enniskillen?

Mr. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the postal authorities at Dublin have communicated with the traffic manager of the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland respecting the acceleration of the morning mails from Dundalk to Enniskillen and the intervening districts; and, if so, with what results?

The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): The Post Office has been in communication with the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland respecting the acceleration of the day mail to Enniskillen. It is found that the Company are not willing to effect the improvement, except upon terms which the Postmaster General would not be justified in accepting.

MASSACRE AT EGHIN.

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can inform the House whether the pro memoriâ presented to the Porte by the British Ambassador at Constantinople (Turkey, No. 7, 1897), on or about the 17th of December last, respecting Hakki Bey, the Kaïmakan at Eghin, Colonel Kara Bey, the Mayor of Eghin, and Sehlik Zadé Hafiz Effendi, with whom, as Sir Philip Currie states, rests the responsibility for the unprovoked massacre of the Armenians by Kurds and Turks extending over three days at Eghin, has met with any satisfactory reply from the Porte; and whether those individuals, or any of them, have been dismissed from the Sultan's service, and received the further punishment which the Ambassador considered they deserved?

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople reports that, in reply to constant representations on his part, the Porte has ordered that a searching inquiry shall be held at once to establish the responsibility of those concerned in the Eghin massacre, and to punish severely those who shall be proved to have abused their authority, and that instructions had been sent to the Vali of Kharput.

PIRBRIGHT RANGES (VOLUNTEERS).

Colonel DALBIAC (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he could explain to the House what was the reason for the order by the Officer Commanding the Aldershot Division suspending all firing at Pirbright Ranges on Saturday, 10th April; whether it was necessary that such order should extend to firing after 4 p.m.; and whether, in view of the fact that a considerable number of Volunteers who have been accorded the privilege of using these ranges on Saturday afternoons were present, at considerable expense, on that afternoon and unable to use the ranges, any such order which may be necessary in future may be promulgated two or three days in advance, in order to give officers commanding Volunteers reasonable time to inform those under their command of the order, and so that unnecessary expense to corps and much needless discouragement to officers and men may be avoided?

Mr. BRODRICK: The General Officer Commanding at Aldershot, in response to a request from the Master of the Hounds, who were to draw Chobham Ridges on the 10th April, suspended firing at the Pirbright Ranges on that day. He was not aware that the Pirbright Range had been promised on that day to certain Volunteers; but on learning the fact, telegrams were sent to the headquarters of the Volunteer corps concerned. Apparently these failed to stop about 50 Volunteers, who arrived on the 10th, and were allowed to fire that afternoon on the Bisley Range. Arrangements will be made that longer notice shall be given in future.

CRETE.

Mr. H. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any agreement has been come to by the European Concert in regard to the evacuation of Crete by the Turkish troops now in that island; whether, if so, these troops will be allowed, after leaving Crete, to join in active operations of the Turkish forces against Greece; whether, in view of the advantage to the Ottoman Empire of being relieved from defending Crete against the Greek forces, by the Concert having proclaimed the neutrality of that island, it is intended to declare any portion of the Greek kingdom neutral, and to forbid its attack by the Turkish forces; and, whether the prohibition in regard to landing provisions in Crete is still operative?

*Mr. CURZON: No agreement has been come to for the withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Crete. It is the opinion of the majority of the Powers that the Greek troops should leave first. Moreover, the Admirals reported a short time ago that the deportation of the Turkish troops was a grave question and must not be hastily conducted, there being 49,000 unprotected Cretan Mohammedans in Candia alone, whom the withdrawal of the Turkish garrison would expose to imminent peril. The conditions in regard to the troops being employed subsequently on either side would no doubt be similar. The Powers have no intention of occupying any portion of Greek territory, and declaring it neutral. The question of the exact method in which the blockade shall be applied as regards provisions is one for the Admirals; but the latest report from them, dated yesterday, is to the effect that there is no scarcity of food in the interior.

Mr. LABOUCHERE asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could say whether this country was one of the majority?

*Mr. CURZON: I would rather give no answer to such a Question as that. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Colonel Vassos and the Cretans have been informed what is the precise extent of Cretan territory which the Powers regard as neutral ground; and, whether the Powers guarantee that no troops, regular or irregular, shall be allowed to sally forth from that neutral territory for the purpose of attackng Colonel Vassos or the Cretans?

*Mr. CURZON: Her Majesty's Government are not aware of the exact terms of the communications that have recently passed between the Admirals and Colonel Vassos, nor to what extent such communications are now possible. At an interview which the Italian Consul had with him on the 20th April, Colonel Vassos stated that he feared great complications might arise, but would do his best to prevent them. The insurgent leaders have unquestionably received full information as to the limits of the military cordon established by the Powers. The object of the latter is that the whole island should be neutral, and the Turkish troops are restrained as far as possible from attacking the Christian Cretans, but as the latter are constantly assailing the positions round the towns occupied by the Powers, and have been supplied either from Greek sources or otherwise with cannon for the purpose, the attempt to obtain a cessation of all hostilities has not hitherto been successful, and measures of resistance are at times necessitated for the safety of the European forces and the population under their protection.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): May I ask whether the neutralisation of this territory is carried out by the authority of the Powers, exclusively under the authority of the Sultan, or whether it is against the wishes of the Sultan?

*Mr. CURZON: There is no reason whatever to believe that it is contrary to the wishes of the Sultan, but the constitution of the military cordon has undoubtedly been undertaken on their responsibility by the Admirals of the allied Fleets.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR: Has the sanction of the Sultan been formally obtained?

*Mr. CURZON: The entire proceedings of the Powers in Crete are subject to and have received the sanction of the Sultan. [Cheers.]

Mr. STEVENSON: Are we to understand that a declaration has been made by the Powers that the whole island should be considered neutral, or simply the territory within the military cordon?

*Mr. CURZON: I think the hon. Member is confusing two different things. The territory within the military cordon is under the protection of the Powers exercised by means of their forces. It is the design and the desire of the Powers that in the war between Greece and Turkey the whole island, which they have taken under their protection, should be regarded as neutral.

TURCO-GREEK WAR.

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if, war having been declared between Turkey and Greece, coal in a neutral bottom intended for Turkey or Greece is contraband of war; if coal in a Greek or Turkish bottom intended for Greece or Turkey is contraband of war; and, if coal in a Greek or Turkish bottom intended for a neutral State is contraband of war?

*Mr. CURZON: I am afraid that I can only reply to the hon. Member in the same sense as in replies to similar Questions that have been addressed to Her Majesty's Government on previous occasions. It would be a dangerous and unusual course for Her Majesty's Government to attempt to define by a general statement what is or is not contraband of war. Coal has been held not to be contraband as a general rule, but it is possible that it might in certain cases become so.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in case of war the question of what was or what was not contraband of war was not one exclusively for the Prize Court to determine?

*Mr. CURZON: I always refrain from expressing any opinions in this House upon questions of international law. ["Hear!"]

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a statement in The Times newspaper of yesterday (26th April), in which their special Correspondent, writing from Pentepigadia Pass, asserts that the Turks killed and mutilated all the Greek wounded who fell into their hands; and whether he is able to confirm or disprove this assertion?

*Mr. CURZON: I have seen the passage referred to, but we have received no official information with regard to the allegation. May I add in reply to this and similar Questions, of which the hon. Member himself put two to me yesterday, that it is impossible for the Government to have any official information of detailed incidents at the scene of war, as they have no representative on the spot.

Mr. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): asked whether, considering the serious nature of the allegation which had been made by The Times Correspondent, the Government intended to inquire into its truth?

*Mr. CURZON: I am afraid that it lies outside the scope of Government duties to inquire into the accuracy of all the various statements on one side or the other that appear in the newspapers. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, according to the theory of the Government— [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

Sir EDWARD GOURLEY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether any and what notifications have been issued by the two belligerent Powers, Greece and Turkey, relative to neutral flags and neutral merchandise; (2) will such Power respect the enemy's flag unless carrying contraband of war; and (3) can he state whether corn and other articles of food will be deemed neutral or contraband?

*Mr. CURZON: The Greek Minister notified to Her Majesty's Government on the 21st instant that orders had been given to the Hellenic land and sea forces in conformity with the Declaration of Paris of April 16th 1856. No notification on the subject has been received from the Turkish Government, but they are parties to the same declaration, and may be equally expected to observe it. In answer to the second paragraph, Turkey and Greece would presumably respect neutral goods in enemy's vessels with the exception of contraband of war, and as regards the latter, Her Majesty's Government have uniformly declined to define it.

"MAYFLOWER" (THE LOG OF THE).

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether authority would be given to the Historical Record Commission to print copies of the volume descriptive of th records of the Mayflower, which has been given by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the late American Ambassador for transmission to Washington, in order that the same may be more generally distributed in this country and in the United States of America?

Mr. HANBURY: I assume that the hon. Member means the Historical Manuscripts Commission. It is not for the Treasury to decide what documents that Commission should select for publication, and I would therefore suggest that the hon. Member should communicate direct with the Commission, the Secretary to which is Mr. Cartwright, of the Public Record Office. As to the general distribution of copies in this country, apart from any question of distribution in the United States, it should be remembered that the publications of this Commission are treated as Parliamentary Papers, and, as such, are sold at rates which do not at all represent the real cost of production. It is also the fact that a large number are circulated gratis to Members of both Houses of Parliament.

TOKAT MASSACRE.

Mr. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Military Commander at Tokat, who is referred to in the correspondence relative to the Armenian Question, presented to Parliament in February 1896 (Turkey, No. 2, 1896, p. 329), as having shown great energy in protecting the town and preventing an attempted massacre of Armenians there on 15th November 1895, was removed by the Turkish Government shortly before the recent massacre at Tokat?

Mr. CURZON: We have never heard that the Military Commander at Tokat to whom the hon. Member alludes, was removed under the circumstances mentioned in the Question.

Mr. MORTON asked whether, in view of the fact that the report of the removal of the Military Commander in question was reported in the Daily News of the 24th of last month, the right hon. Gentleman would inquire into the truth of the report?

Mr. CURZON: I think that the hon. Member is under some misapprehension. The Military Commander of Tokat, to whom I think he refers, is the officer who was removed after the massacres, because he was held to have been partly responsible for them.

STATIONERY OFFICE PRINTING CONTRACTS.

Mr. MICHAEL AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when will copies of the remaining contracts entered into by Her Majesty's Stationery Office be printed and circulated, in continuation of those dated 12th and 13th January of the present year?

Mr. HANBURY: The four contracts already presented to which the hon. Member refers are contracts for Parliamentary printing, and the Resolutions passed by the House of Lords and the House of Commons on March 30th and 24th respectively, 1882, require those contracts to lie upon the Table for 40 days before taking effect. It has not hitherto been the practice to make public the other contracts for printing, but I am distinctly in favour of publicity whenever there are no practical arguments against it, and the contracts referred to shall, as they are completed, be laid upon the Table. I do not, however, think that it is necessary to incur the cost of printing them, as the form is in all respects practically identical with that of the four already printed.

ROYAL ARTILLERY OFFICERS.

Captain BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state when the proposed division of the Officers' List of the Royal Artillery is to be carried out?

Mr. BRODRICK: Some details of this division are still under consideration; but the necessary arrangements will shortly be completed.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, under the working of the Bill to amend Section 97 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, the Chesterfield School Board (which makes up its next annual accounts in February 1898) will receive any benefit from this Bill before March 1899?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): All School Board accounts are made up to the 29th of September. Any grant to which the Chesterfield School Board may be entitled under the Bill will be paid as soon after the 29th of September of this year as the claim has been received and the Education Department are in a position to examine it.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether Wellingborough should not be included in the list of School Boards entitled to grants under the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill; whether there are other School Boards in the same position; and whether he will issue a supplementary list of Boards so entitled?

SIR J. GORST: Yes, Sir; the Wellingborough School Board is entitled to a grant. No doubt, there are many Boards in the same position; but, as I have several times stated, the materials in the possession of the Education Department do not enable them to furnish anything like an accurate Return.

MEDICAL INSPECTORSHIP OF PRISONS.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Dr. Gover has resigned the Medical Inspectorship of Prisons; and, if so, whether he will take the opportunity to appoint a medical man to be a member of the Prisons Board, in accordance with the recommendation of the late Committee on Prisons, and thus assimilate the constitution of the Prisons Board in England to that of the Prisons Board in Ireland?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): It is the case that Dr. Gover has resigned his appointment, but I have already decided, after giving full consideration to the recommendation of the Prisons Committee, that it is not possible to dispense with the services of a medical inspector, and have, therefore, appointed Dr. Smalley, the medical officer at Parkhurst, in succession to Dr. Gover. This does not, of course, determine the question of the appointment of a medical member of the Board, but I do not at present contemplate making any such appointment.

CANADIAN TARIFF.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies (1) whether he has observed that the new Canadian tariff provides for preferential trade relations with the Mother Country; and (2) whether Her Majesty's Government will embrace the earliest opportunity of recognising and, if practicable, reciprocating the action of the Government of the Dominion in this important matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. Her Majesty's Government cordially appreciate the friendly spirit which is shewn by the action of the Dominion Government, but I understand that the proposals do not depend on any alteration of the system of free trade established in the United Kingdom.

ALLOTMENTS (CORNWALL).

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the County Council for the County of Cornwall, after holding the inquiries required by Sections 9 and 10 of the Local Government Act of 1894, made an Order authorising the Parish Council of Veryan to hire certain lands compulsorily for allotments; and that the Local Government Board have disallowed such Order; and whether he will state the reasons for reversing the decision arrived at after inquiry by the representatives of the ratepayers of the county?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The facts are as stated in the Question. A local inquiry was held by one of the inspectors of the Board, at which the evidence of those interested was taken. It appeared that there was no sufficient proof that the Parish Council were unable to hire land by agreement, or that there was any general demand for allotments in the parish. At the time of the inquiry there were only two applicants for allotments in the land proposed to be hired compulsorily, and it appeared that the Parish Council had not been able to let for allotments a field which they had previously hired for that purpose. For these and other reasons, and among them the probability that a burden would have been imposed upon the parish, the Board arrived at the conclusion that the Order should not be confirmed.

FUGITIVE SLAVES AT MOMBASA.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether his attention has been drawn to a statement made by Bishop Tucker, that should a slave run away in Mombasa and take refuge within the ten mile limit, the Commissioner, on being applied to, issues what is practically a demand for his surrender; (2) why soldiers in the pay of the British Government are employed in the search for runaways; and (3) whether he can give the House any information on the subject?

*MR. CURZON: The facts on the mainland are not quite correctly represented in the first paragraph. Her Majesty's Commissioner has instructions to exercise his own discretion in each particular case, and is under no obligation to act in the manner suggested in the Question.

·CREWE (REPRESENTATION OF).

MR. LABOUCHERE: It will be convenient to a large number of persons at Crewe and elsewhere if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be good enough to say whether he has received any intimation from the present sitting Member for Crewe that he is anxious to serve Her Majesty as Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, and whether, if so, a favourable answer has been given? [Laughter.]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: This appears to be one of the numerous instances in which a newspaper report is incorrect. No such application has been received.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then may I ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies how it comes that he, a Minister of the Crown, sent a letter to Mr. Marriott sympathising with him as a candidate and hoping he would be returned? [Laughter].

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I always reply to all letters addressed to me in suitable terms. [Loud laughter.]

TRANSVAAL (UITLANDERS).

MR. F. A. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government of Cape Colony has received an intimation that under no circumstances would the Imperial Government insist upon the redress of the grievances of the Transvaal Uitlanders?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No communication of the kind referred to has passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Cape Colony.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. W. S. ROBSON (South Shields) asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government would consent to take Class II., Foreign Office Vote, next Friday night?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I had not proposed to take Class II., Foreign Office Vote, next Friday, though I am perfectly ready to conform the plans of the Government to the wishes of the House with regard to the arrangements of Supply, as I have always been under similar circumstances. The state of the case with regard to Supply is this: We are pledged to take Friday, May 14, for Irish Supply. There are two Fridays before that. We have had seven discussions upon foreign affairs in the course of the present Session, and on the whole I am disposed to think, unless a demand is made upon the Government by the front Opposition Bench, that it will be more convenient to proceed in ordinary course with the Civil Service

Votes next Friday than to take the Foreign Office Vote on Friday. No doubt a discussion later on in the Session will be imperatively demanded in the interests of free debate. Therefore, I will give no definite reply at the present time; but will endeavour to find out whether there is any widespread wish for another discussion on foreign affairs, and if an intimation is made to me to that effect from responsible quarters, I shall of course accede to such a desire.

Sir C. DILKE asked the President of the Board of Trade why the Government did not proceed last night with the Merchant Shipping (Undermanning) Bill, the second principal Measure of the evening, in consequence of which the House was counted out shortly after 9 o'clock?

Mr. RITCHIE: I do not think it was in consequence of that. The reason the Bill in question was not proceeded with was that there was a general desire expressed by those interested that, having regard to certain matters of controversy that would arise, it would not be desirable or in accordance with custom that such a Measure should be taken the first night after the House reassembled.

COAL MINES REGULATION BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Tomorrow till Wednesday, 5th May.

COUNTY COUNCILLORS (QUALIFICATION OF WOMEN) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for the Second Reading this day read and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

LOCOMOTIVES ON HIGHWAYS BILL.

Second Reading deferred from this day till Thursday.

MOTION.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (SCOTLAND) LOANS.

Bill to amend the Local Authorities (Scotland) Loans Act 1891, and the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Parker Smith, Mr. Dalziel, Mr. Haldane and Mr. Orr-Ewing; presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Thursday, and to be printed.—[Bill 208.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EAST INDIA (OFFICERS OF GENERAL LIST).

*Mr. J. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) rose to call attention to the grievance of the Officers of the General List (Indian Army) in the matter of their pensions; and to move:—

> "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the grievances of the officers on the General List of the Indian Army in the matter of their succession to Colonels' allowances, and to report to the House thereon."

He pointed out that the officers felt that they had a real grievance to complain of, and that there was no tribunal to which they could appeal except the House of Commons. He could not conceive why it was that the Government, who were so ready to refer every controversial question to the consideration of a Committee or a Royal Commission, should have hesitated to refer this matter to a Committee. The Government had been very prolific in appointing Committees and Royal Commissions. These officers felt they had a legitimate grievance, and the question was of serious importance to them, because it represented a loss of something like £400 a year. They claimed that they were entitled to Colonels' allowances. It was felt by them also to be a hardship that officers who were their juniors in the Service should have the advantage of the privileges which were denied to them. One case had been brought to his notice in which an officer who had served in command of a regiment did not receive his Colonel's allowance, while his second in command and actually his junior in entering the Service did. These were officers who joined the Service between 1859 and 1861, and were nominated under the old conditions of things by the directors of the East India Company. Every one joined under the same conditions as the officers of the East India Company's Service. They were appointed by the directors; they paid their passage out to India, and they had to this day to subscribe to the old East India Company's funds, established for the relief of widows and orphans. At the time when these officers were nominated, their future position was uncertain. The Mutiny was scarcely at an end, and there was a question in the minds of the authorities at home as to what would be the future of the East India Company's Service. When nominated, each officer was asked to sign a paper, which contained, among other questions the following:—

> "Have you been informed that all the appointments now made are to be subject to any alterations that may be decided on?"

He thought the last words were of considerable importance in estimating the position of these officers at the present day. What was the position of affairs at that time? First, considerable variations had been introduced in the wording of that question from time to time. When it came under the consideration of the India Office, it stood there simply "subject to any alterations that may be decided on," but the India Office, in considering these claims, had more than once altered the phraseology, turning the question into one asking these gentlemen, if they accepted their appointments "subject to any alteration which may be subsequently made in the condition of service." The explanation was perfectly plain and simple. It was to be found in a Despatch written by the Secretary of State for India to the Viceroy on September 30, 1859, in which a communication was made in reference to the probability of some change being made in the constitution of the Indian Army. It was decided in December following by the Government that all future appointments should be made "subject to any alteration that may be decided on." This showed the reason and the intention of putting the question to those gentlemen who had been appointed. A Royal Commission was sitting at that time to decide on the future position of the officers, and on what lines the Indian forces should be reorganised. He contended that the words "decided on" imported a conclusion of the matter at the moment under consideration. It was not subject to any alteration hereafter; it was subject to any alteration which might be decided on. He suggested that the House must lay weight on the word "decided," and the answer to that was to be found in the Royal Commission which was sitting to decide on the future of the Indian Army. The Henley Clause gave particular privileges and rights to those who had served in the forces of the East India Company; but while the officers did not base their claim on that clause, or on the fact that as cadets they were appointed as officers of the East India Company, they did base their case on the fact that they were officers of the Indian Army. The Henley Clause stated (21 and 22 Vic. c. 106, 1858) that the officers were—

> "to be entitled to the like pay, pension allowances and privileges, and the like advantages as regards promotion and otherwise as if they had continued in the service of the Company."

Then, according to Section 57 of the same clause, it was—

> "lawful for Her Majesty, by Order in Council, to alter or regulate the terms and conditions of service under which persons hereafter entering Her Majesty's Indian Forces shall be commissioned."

Any Order in Council was to be laid before Parliament, but he had searched, and he did not believe any such Order could be found which purported to alter the conditons of the service under which these gentlemen joined. They were officers of the Indian Army, and as such were entitled to those rights and privileges which had since been taken away. There was a distinction between the Honourable East India Company's Service and the Indian Army. A great deal of the confusion which had attended the consideration of this particular question was due to the fact that no sufficient distinction had been drawn between the officers of the East India Company's Service and those who belonged to the Indian Army. The officers for whom he was speaking claimed—and claimed rightly—to be officers of the Indian Army. That they were entitled to that position was made sufficiently clear by the Governor General's Order of 1861. When these officers arrived in India, the condition of things was an uncertain one. It was not known what their future was to be. But the result of the Royal Commission was practically that the Indian Army was split up into three divisions. There was the local list, comprising those who opted to serve in the local forces in India; there was the general list, comprising those who volunteered for the general service of the Crown; and there was the Staff Corps, created for the first time, of which every officer who had since joined the Indian Army had been a member. All the officers who belonged to the East India Company's Service were given the right of choosing to which of these Services they would belong. The Governor General's Order, No. 960, of 1861, said:—

> "According to the declaration made by these young officers, they have no choice, but the option may be given them, in common with other young officers of the Indian Army, to volunteer for general or local service or for Staff Corps."

He laid stress on the words "in common with other young officers of the Indian Army," because those words clearly indicated that they were officers of the Indian Army, and this option was given to them, in common with other officers of the Indian Army, to volunteer for general or local service or for the Staff Corps. They volunteered for the local service. In a Despatch dated July 31, 1862, Sir Charles Wood, the then Secretary of State, dealt with the whole question. Apparently the Government of Bombay had recommended that each Lieutenant-Colonel should be promoted to a colonelcy, and receive a Colonel's allowance after the expiration of ten years. Sir C. Wood decided that:—

> "all officers who may have held the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel on January 1, 1862, will also be entitled to promotion to the superior grade of Colonel, with Colonel's allowances, if the step come to them in the ordinary course, before the completion of 12 years' service as Lieutenant-Colonel; but when these Lieutenant-Colonels have been removed from the lists the promotion of those whose Commissions bear date on January 1, 1862, or subsequently, will only be made, as in the Staff Corps, after 12 years' service in that grade."

Here it was clearly laid down that those officers who attained the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel after January 1st, 1862, would be entitled to a Colonel's allowances after 12 years' service as Lieutenant-Colonel. In this Despatch Sir C. Wood also said:—

> "The principle upon which the succession to Colonel's allowances of officers of the Indian Army who have not joined the Staff Corps or the new Line Regiments is to be hereafter regulated, is to be considered as determined by this arrangement."

Here, then, they had this 12 years' arrangement clearly laid down, and it was expressly stated that the principle upon which the succession of these gentlemen to Colonels' allowances was to be regulated was to be considered as determined by this arrangement. He did not know whether the India Office proposed to rest their case upon the ground that these gentlemen were not officers of the Indian Army. If that was their intention, he would refer them to the official Army List for this year, where they would find the names of these gentlemen under the head of "Indian Army, General List." The next Despatch to which he would call attention was the Despatch of June 17, 1864, written by Sir C. Wood to the Governor General of India. It began by saying that—

> "it was also considered desirable, on general grounds, to remove, as far as possible, all distinctions between the officers of Her Majesty's general and Indian Armies, and to form them prospectively into one united body, retaining for the Indian officers in the meantime such advantages as were peculiar to their service."

Here it should be observed the distinction was drawn between the Indian officers and the general officers—in other words, between those on the local list and those on the General List. The distinction drawn was not between officers of the East India Company and the officers of the "Indian Army." Sir C. Wood went on to say:—

> "It might perhaps have prevented a good deal of misunderstanding if the measures for these various objects, which were distinct in themselves, had been undertaken separately, but so much was inevitable, and it was so desirable that the full extent of any changes should be known at once, and that men's minds should not be left in uncertainty as to their future condition, that it was determined to carry into effect, without loss of time, all the measures required for the changes which were to be made."

Those were grave and serious words, and the men who read that Despatch, and determined their future careers on the wording of that Despatch were entitled to rely upon it. In view of that declaration, it passed belief that in 1882 a new and further change would be made wholly to their disadvantage. In the 19th paragraph of the Despatch the Secretary of State said:—

> "It appears that of the officers of the Indian Army who joined the Line Regiments the whole of the Artillery and Engineers, and those who joined the Staff Corps, have been generally benefited by the change."

Then came the words:—

> "If to this number be added the whole of the officers who entered the Service since 1858 on conditions subject to any change that might be introduced into the Service, it will be seen that there will remain a comparatively small number who can have any real cause of complaint."

Showing clearly that these officers (for there were none others to whom this description could apply) were to be "benefited by the change." A subsequent paragraph of the Despatch ran:—

> "The general promotion of the Indian officers will be accelerated, and to every officer, including the Cadet who entered the Service so lately as December 1861, his promotion through every grade, with the pay thereunto belonging, as if the whole native Army of India had been kept up, is assured, and his right to Indian pension is maintained."

These extracts showed what assurances were given to the officers on the General List of the Indian Army, to whom alone they were applicable. In another paragraph these words occurred:—

> "Nor is it probable that more than a very few cases can occur in which an officer will not attain the Colonel's allowance after a shorter total period of service, even though he may remain rather longer in the grade of Lieutenant-Colonel."

Then the 81st paragraph stated:—

> "With this measure the arrangements as regards the officers of the Indian Army will be closed. The advantages which have been conferred upon the majority of those officers have already been pointed out, and it cannot be doubted that under the system now established the officers of the Indian Army will, for the most part, attain to the several regimental grades, including that of Colonel, with Colonel's allowance, in a shorter period of service than they would have done had the several Staff Corps not been formed and had no change in the constitution of the Indian Army taken place."

He did not think a more explicit pledge could be given to any body of men than that which was given in the Despatch of 1864 from which he had read. That that was the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton was clear from an answer the right hon. Gentleman gave to a question put by Sir Richard Temple in 1895 on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Henry Fowler) said:—

> "The passage in the Order of 1864 refers to the prospects of promotion and pension under the rules then in force, including the succession to the Colonel's allowance; but as regards the officers who entered the Service since 1858, this promise is subject to any change that might be introduced into the Service."

The House would see that the right hon. Gentleman distinctly called it a promise —["hear, hear!"]—a promise that these officers should have the right of succession to the Colonel's allowance after 12 years' service as Lieut.-Colonel. He now came to the last Act. The House would hardly believe that 18 years afterwards —in 1882—although in the meanwhile entrance into the Staff Corps had been closed to these gentlemen, entrance into which would have secured to them this allowance, they were told that instead of getting their rights after they had served 12 years as Lieut.-Colonel, they were to be put on a pension of £750 a year, which meant a clear and absolute loss to them of nearly £400 a year. Thus these particular gentlemen had been singled out from among all those serving in Her Majesty's Indian Army for this treatment. After relying on the promise given in the Despatch of 1864, and after having done good service for Her Majesty, they were told that instead of being entitled after 12 years' service as Lieut.-Colonel to the Colonel's allowance, they were reduced to a pension of £750 a year, and were told to be thankful for that. He need hardly say that he had no personal interest in the case of these gentlemen. ["Hear, hear!"] He had taken it up as a matter of duty. He had been exercised in his mind to see what possible answer could be made to the claims of these Gentlemen. Of course, he was well aware that the Government had always the power to deal with those in their service as they pleased; but power was one thing and right was another—["hear, hear!"] —and he did not propose to discuss the question from the basis of what it was in the power of the Government to do, but from the basis of what was the right and honest thing to do. He believed that considerable reliance was placed on the declaration which these gentlemen had signed, but there could be no question that all the subsequent alterations and emendations did not exist in the original answer received. Then, again, the question had sometimes been raised that these gentlemen were not officers in the Indian Army, but to this day their names appeared in the official Army List as such, so that that ground of objection disappeared. Again, it had sometimes been repeated in the voluminous correspondence on the subject that these officers were better off than they might have expected to be; but they had not got what had been promised to them, and they were not so well off as they had a right to expect. The probability of succession to the Colonel's allowance had been considered by a Committee, whose finding was embodied in a Despatch, and he found that that Committee reported that the 12 years' term was two years in excess of the fair term, the average of which had been a little over 10 years; so that these officers might fairly have expected to get their Colonel's allowance after 10 years' service as Lieut.-Colonel. [" Hear, hear !"] Then, finally, they were told that the assurance given in the Despatch of 1864 had been fulfilled. These gentlemen would not be asking the House to consider their case that day if that assurance had been fulfilled, and he believed it would pass the ingenuity of the noble Lord to make out that it had been fulfilled in any shape or form. [" Hear, hear ! "] He had not elaborated the case as he might have done. He had felt it his duty to put it as shortly, and he hoped as intelligibly, as he possibly could before the House. What he was asking for was not a decision of the House on the claims of these gentlemen, but that they might be referred to the impartial judgment of a Select Committee, and he failed to see why Her Majesty's Government should refuse that. The Government seemed to have made it a Government matter in issuing a Whip of four lines against the Motion. He had always thought there was a lack of the sense of proportion in those who were responsible for Government Whips. A Whip of three lines only was issued on the Necessitous School Boards Bill. That showed the comparative importance which the Government attached to a Measure like that, and the investigation of the conduct of a department of the Government for which they themselves as a Government could not be in any shape or form responsible. [" Hear, hear ! "] The Government had shut the door against anything like inquiry into this question, and had made it a Government matter. There was a passage in Lord Macaulay's Essay on Lord Clive, to the effect that the strength and foundation of British rule in India was that the Sepoy, however humble and poor he might be, felt that under the rule of the Company his bread and salt were assured to him, however long he might live. If that was so with the Indian soldier, should it be less so with the English officer, who had led him in many hard-fought and difficult engagements? [" Hear, hear ! "] That was the view taken in early days under the Honourable East India Company, and now it was found, in contrast to that, that no inquiry could be made into the manner in which the India Office from time to time had treated these men who had served them so well. He could imagine only one thing more damaging to a Government than an accusation that they had treated harshly and unfairly those who had done good service in years past. [" Hear, hear ! "] To such an accusation any Government might be exposed and no harm was done, but when those who had an opportunity of having such an accusation honestly and fairly inquired into turned away from it and endeavoured by all the means at the disposal of a Government to shut the door against inquiry into it, there was only one conclusion likely to be drawn. [" Hear, hear ! "] He felt that this ought never to have been made a Government matter. These gentlemen had a strong and legitimate grievance, as he had shown, and he would, therefore, conclude by moving the Resolution which stood in his name. [" Hear, hear ! "]

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central), in seconding the Resolution, asked for the indulgence of the House if he traversed again some of the ground covered by his hon. Friend; but this grievance of officers in the general list was so intricate in itself, and depended so much on the interpretations of warrants and dispatches that he was bound to trespass on the patience of the House to a certain extent, and to ask for the indulgence hon. Members were always ready to give. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University, who dealt with this matter as Under Secretary for India on a former occasion, stated, in opening the case for the Government, that he believed the subject was one which hardly anyone understood, and which no one could solve. He could only say for himself that for years he had studied this question, and the more he studied it, the more difficult and the less clear it seemed. He agreed with his hon. Friend that it was next to impossible to make the subject thoroughly clear to Members of the House except through the medium of a Select Committee. That was why they appealed for a Select Committee. He knew his noble Friend would say that he was quite able to put before the House how they ought to vote on this question, but all he could say to his noble Friend and the House was this—if they could make out a primâ facie case for an inquiry, they were entitled to it. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought that his hon. Friend had made out such a case. Now, what would his noble Friend say? He would say that he was advised by his Departmental advisers that these gentlemen had no case; but most people who had gone into the facts, as he had conscientiously done, were convinced that they had an excellent case. He thought that that was the interpretation placed on the warrants and dispatches. Of course, he did not blame his noble Friend for the attitude which he assumed. He was more or less at the mercy of his military advisers, but if his noble Friend said that he was only taking the same view which had been taken by every other Secretary of State, he could only reply that that was one more reason why they should come to that House. What was the good of arraigning the officials before the Secretary of State? Why, his noble Friend was their mere mouthpiece in that House. He said, on behalf of those whose cause he advocated, that they were willing to trust the House of Commons, and if it was satisfied, after inquiry, that they had no case, they would abide by that decision. As matters stood, the only appeal they had was to people who had already prejudiced their claims. He had, as he said—and the House would believe him—gone very carefully and honestly into the facts, and he had endeavoured to understand the question, and, looking at it impartially, had come to the conclusion that there was a legitimate claim on the Indian Government. These officers had rendered their services when India was passing through its most critical moments, and now their allowances were not to be granted. The hon. Member proceeded to read a number of extracts from orders and dispatches bearing on the claims of the officers, and urged that the whole circumstances called for investigation. One extract he quoted was the following statement of the Military Secretary, who said:—

> "The General List Officers were appointed to the Indian Army subject to any alterations in the conditions of service which might hereafter be determined on."

He asked hon. Members to mark the wording of that sentence—"the conditions of service which might hereafter be determined on." As his hon. Friend had pointed out, there was not one syllable about "hereafter" in the original. What was said in the dispatch confirming the form of declaration was that they were to be subject to any alteration in the conditions of the Service, meaning, of course, the whole Indian Army, and meaning the alterations then being considered by the Royal Commission sitting on the reorganisation of the Army. In 1858 the exact wording was:—

> "All future appointments of Cadets should be made subject to any alteration that may be decided upon."

Why? Because a Royal Commission was sitting. What alterations were contemplated? Alterations suggested by the Royal Commission. When, therefore, the Cadets agreed to abide by any alterations that might be decided upon, it was quite clear they agreed only to the alterations to be made by the Royal Commission. Yet it was now pretended that this "declaration"—this agreement—not only debarred the General List Officers from the advantages which the General Order of 1864 "assured" and "maintained" to them in common with all officers of the Indian Army, but bound them to accept "any alterations in the conditions of service which might thereafter be determined upon." The words of the General Order of 1864, which was an honest and straightforward document, described the General List Officers as officers who entered the Service on "conditions subject to any change that might be introduced into the Service." It did not say "might or may hereafter be introduced." Such were the weapons which the India Office placed in his noble Friend's hands, and he had no doubt the noble Lord would make the best use of them. He dared say the noble Lord would trot out again the question of expense, but he would undertake to prove, if a Committee were appointed, that the expense would be very small indeed. Of course his noble Friend would produce numerous figures to contradict him, but that, again, would be obvious proof that the House was not the place to decide such a question. It was not across the floor of the House of Commons that the question could be settled. What was wanted was some small independent tribunal. He could not understand why his noble Friend resisted the suggestion made, unless there was something they knew nothing of in the background, and that he could not believe for one moment. There was no doubt his noble Friend did betray great mistrust of the House of Commons, and perhaps he was wise in doing so, because that mistrust was the strongest evidence of the strength of their case. The noble Lord was afraid to let the case go before a Committee, because he knew what the decision of a Committee would be; he knew that justice would be done there. What was the course the noble Lord had pursued? He had not left them free and unfettered to decide this matter, a matter which was purely administrative, and in which Party obligation was in no way at stake. He had seen a good many four-line Whips, but he had never known such a Whip issued in order to enable a Department to avoid a free inquiry. He asked the noble Lord to remember that if it was excellent to have a giant's strength, it was tyranny to use it like a giant. It was unworthy to invoke the aid of a big majority in jockeying 58 poor officers out of their rights. Just as he would refuse to be dictated to on a question like this, he hoped and believed there were many Members of the House who would not listen to the Front Bench, whether it was occupied by Members of this or that Party. Both Front Benches were tarred with the same brush. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton was just as bad as the noble Lord. They all knew that whichever side was in, there was no justice to be got out of a man when once he got on the Front Bench. Let him end as he began. They had not the slightest fear of the House of Commons. They asked for justice. They did not ask hon. Members to pronounce any opinion on the merits of the case. They simply asked to be allowed to go before an impartial tribunal, and not to have their case decided by a packed jury as it were. Before an impartial tribunal he undertook to prove their case up to the hilt. ["Hear, hear!"]

*The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing) said the hon. Member for Horsham had made a very able speech, but he very naturally based it on information supplied to him. He did not wish to interrupt the hon. Gentleman when he was wrong, indeed, had he done so it would have been necessary to interpolate a correction at every sentence. He thought he would be able to show, in the course of his remarks, that there never was a weaker case put before the House of Commons than the present. But before he dealt with the question of the appointment of a Committee, he desired to say there were certain sentiments enunciated by his hon. Friend with which he entirely agreed. He agreed that the Government were bound to keep faith with those they employed. He further agreed that the Government had no right whatever to wriggle out of an engagement by the ambiguity of the language employed; but after all, the Indian Exchequer and the Indian taxpayer had their rights just as much as anybody else. What was the object of the appointment of a Select Committee? It was to reverse the decision of successive Viceroys, of successive Commanders-in-Chief, of successive Secretaries of State, and of every military and civil member of their respective Councils for the last 16 years. There was an absolutely unbroken record of authority against this case, and it must be remembered that military opinion dominated the Indian Government to a greater degree than it did any other administration in Her Majesty's dominions. It was a matter of notoriety that the arrangements made by the Indian Government in connection with these servants were far more generous and liberal than those sanctioned by this House or the Treasury, and, therefore, a very strong case must be made out before the House would attempt to interfere with the Indian Government, and put upon the Indian revenue a charge which the Indian Government considered an injustice. What was the case which his hon. Friends had presented? It was that these officers had been robbed—the hon. Member for Hull used the word jockeyed—out of their right to Colonels' allowances. But these officers were allowed Colonels' allowances; they were entitled to a certain establishment of Colonels' allowances. The number of Colonels' allowances to which this particular branch of the service was entitled was 13. These officers claimed that they had an unlimited right to Colonels' allowances, but the East India Company in the past and the Queen's Government since had always put a limitation on the number of Colonels' allowances, with one single exception. What had made this case complicated was that a number of facts, wholly extraneous to the case, had been dragged in in order to give colour to it. There were two sets of facts kept entirely distinct. The first related to the reform and reorganisation of the Indian Army after the Mutiny, and the second related to those officers who joined the Indian Army subsequent to the date of the transfer of authority. He thought he would be able to make it clear that both his hon. Friends had been misled in the statements they had made. The Indian Mutiny was a terrible Imperial disaster, but it was largely caused by the defective military organisation of the native army in India. It was, therefore, self-evident that as soon as the Powers of the East India Company were transferred to the Crown, the first duty of the Crown would be thoroughly to reorganise the native army. Great sympathy was felt with the European officers of the Company, many of whom had died at their posts during the Mutiny, and though the rapid rehabilitation of British influence in India was largely due to the skill and valour of others, there was a strong feeling in the House of Commons that when the transference of powers took place the officers of the old Company should not be prejudiced by the change. While the Bill was before Parliament, a Committee was formed for the protection of the interests of these officers, and the Committee entered into various negotiations with the Government for the insertion of words, and ultimately certain words contained in the well known "Henley Clause" were agreed to. Those words were extremely wide, and were such as no Parliament nowadays would assent to. It was laid down that these officers—

> "shall be under the same obligation to serve Her Majesty as they would have been to serve under the said Company, and shall be liable to serve within the same territorial limits only . . . . and be entitled to the like pay, pensions, allowances, and privileges, and the like advantages as regards promotion and otherwise as if they had continued in the service of the said Company."

Those words applied to the old East India Company's officers alone. They were purely retrospective in their action, and a subsequent clause was inserted applying to all the officers who came in afterwards:—

> "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time, by Order in Council, to alter or regulate the terms and conditions of service under which persons hereafter entering Her Majesty's Indian Forces shall be commissioned."

There were, therefore, two sections in the Act. Under the one came all the old East India Company's officers, and under the other came all those who joined subsequently to 1858. What his hon. Friend wished to do was to transfer the officers under the latter section to the former. If that proposal were assented to, he must say distinctly that it would be a gross breach of faith with the Indian Government, on whom the Henley Clause had placed a tremendous obligation. In the work of reorganising the Indian Army, the Henley Clause was a millstone round the neck of the Indian Government. They could not move in any direction without coming into contact with the guaranteed interests of the old officers. In the old days the Army was organised under a system analogous to that in this country, and promotion was strictly by regimental seniority. To every regiment were attached some 30 officers, on the average; and to every battalion was apportioned one Colonel's allowance and no more. After the Indian Mutiny, half the battalions disappeared. Various Commissions reported in favour of reductions, and the Army was reduced from 250,000 to 120,000 men. An entirely different system of officering was also introduced—the irregular system, first applied to the cavalry and then to the infantry—under which the number of officers attached to a regiment was reduced to less than one-fourth of the old number. And yet the Indian Government had to give to every single officer the same pay, allowances, and promotion, as would have existed if the old system had continued. Commission after Commission was appointed to see that the terms of the Henley Clause was complied with, and concession after concession was made to meet the difficulty. The first of these concessions took the form of the Order read out by the hon. Member, giving Colonels' allowances after 12 years' service as full Lieutenant-Colonel. That Order applied only to the officers of the old East India Company, and was in no sense applicable to the officers whose case was brought forward by his hon. Friend. In 1866, when the present Prime Minister was Secretary of State for India, a further Commission had reported that, notwithstanding all the concessions made, the guarantee clause had not been fulfilled as regarded the colonels' allowances to the old officers, and in despair the Government made a tremendous concession to those officers. In order to have a free hand in future in dealing with all these military problems, on which the security of India depended, it was necessary to buy out all these officers; and the Government allowed them to come into the Staff Corps, and, after 12 years' service as Lieutenant-Colonel, to obtain Colonels' allowances without regard to the number on the list. Now his hon. Friend wished to apply those terms to the officers who had joined subsequently to 1858. Every military authority admitted that from the laxity of wording in the Henley Clause the reorganisation of the Indian Army had cost India millions more than would otherwise have been necessary; and Parliament ought to be very careful before adding to the already heavy non-effective charges of the Indian Army. As to the officers whose case had been brought forward by his hon. Friend, every one of those officers joined subsequently to the termination of the powers of the East India Company.

*MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE: If my right hon. Friend will pardon me, I have the names here of the directors who nominated them.

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said that he thought his hon. Friend had fallen into error. What occurred was that the whole of the powers of the Board of Directors ceased, and were transferred to the Secretary of State in Council. But a certain number of the directors were on the Council, where, however, they no longer acted as directors. So careful were the Indian Government, that they put under the Henley Clause all the officers who up to that time had been nominated by the East India Company, but who had not actually joined the Service. His hon. Friend had referred to the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the terms under which those officers should serve. His hon. Friend must know that that Commission laid down that all these officers came in under the new conditions. It was idle to pretend now that they did not know they were coming in under the new conditions. They went out to India, and were put on the general list; but in 1861, after two years, the reforms in the Indian Army had so far established themselves that certain alternatives of service were offered to these young men. They might join the British regiments, which had been transferred from the Company to the Crown, taking with them the Indian pensions, but having no claim to Colonels' allowances, or they might join the Staff Corps—a service which had been instituted for the purpose of officering regiments on the irregular system. In that corps the promotion was regulated by length of service, and the officers were entitled to Colonels' allowances at the ratio of 1 to 30—the old ratio under the Company. Some of the officers selected the one service and some the other. Between 1861 and 1866 every officer on the general list —all those whose claims were advocated by his hon. Friend—could have joined the Staff Corps; but all did not, because they got better terms by remaining on the general list. When this tremendous concession was made in 1866, officers were requested to join the Staff Corps before a certain day. Having done that, they were entitled, after a certain term of service, to full Colonels' allowances. There were a certain number of officers of the general list and from British regiments who had come in between 1861 and 1866, and the question which the Indian Government had to consider was whether this exceptional privilege should be extended to those officers. For the purposes of uniformity, and to avoid having to deal with men on the same list in different ways, that concession was extended to the limited number of these men then in the Staff Corps. With the exception of this special concession of 1866, the ratio maintained had always been that of 1 to 30. His hon. Friend talked about "robbery." The facts showed how groundless was that charge. Under the Order of 1864 the old rates of pensions were, after 20 years' service, £191, which was raised by the new Order of 1882 to £250; after 24 years' service £292, raised to £365; after 28 years' service, £365, raised to £500; after 32 years' service £456, raised to £700; and after 38 years' service £456, raised to £700. With the fullest desire to do justice he had looked carefully into the matter, and had found an absolutely unbroken record of official opinion against the claims put forward on behalf of these officers. But he was desirous, before coming to a final conclusion, to consult an authority higher than a Committee of the House of Commons—he meant the Military Committee of the Council of India, consisting of Field-Marshal Sir Donald Stewart, Sir Archibald Alison, and General Gordon; and he asked them to look into the matter, with the result that they had reported as follows:—

> "There are no grounds for admitting the claim that all the officers of the General Lists of Cavalry and Infantry should receive the Colonel's allowance after 12 years' service as substantive Lieutenant-Colonel. This concession was originally granted in 1862 to officers of the East India Company's Army, whose names were borne on regimental cadres and on the gradation lists of Cavalry and Infantry in the three presidencies, and was subsequently extended in 1866 to all officers of that army and to all officers who joined the Staff Corps on or before the 12th September 1866. The officers of the General Lists were not officers of the Company's Army, and consequently not under the Henley Clause of the Act of 1858, which guaranteed to the latter pay, pension and promotion, 'as if they had continued in the service of the said Company.' The officers of the General Lists were appointed by Her Majesty to Her Majesty's Indian Military Forces after the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown, and the 57th Section of the Act gave Her Majesty full power to frame new regulations as regards pay, promotion, &c., for all these officers. There is no foundation for the statement that, by orders issued subsequent to 1858, the officers of the General Lists acquired the status and privileges of officers of the Company's Army. The General Order of 1864, on which they found their claim, stated that 'to every officer, including the Cadet who entered the service so lately as December 1861, his promotion through every grade, with the pay thereunto belonging, as if the whole native army of India had been kept up, is assured, and his right to Indian pension is maintained." This assurance has been fulfilled. The officers of the General Lists have received their promotion at rates quicker than those previously prevailing, their pay has been improved, and their pensions are considerably higher than the Company's rates. They were given an establishment of 13 Colonels' allowances, that is, at the rate of one to 30 officers, which was the ratio originally fixed for the Staff Corps, and more than this they had no reason to expect. It cannot be maintained that the Order of 1864 gave them a right to a concession granted in 1866 to a different class of officers, in order to remedy a grievance alleged to have arisen from non-fulfilment of the guarantee given by the Henley Clause of 1858, which did not apply to the General Lists."

It was said that this was a small matter—that there were only a few officers concerned; but if the House appointed a Committee to investigate the conditions under which those officers had enlisted, they would have to inquire into the cases not only of those on the effective list, but of those who had retired from the effective list in the belief that the decisions of the Secretary of State were final. He would ask, Would this claim be granted if it were to apply to English revenue? ["Hear, hear!"] It seemed to him it was a claim that the House could not possibly assent to. At the present moment there was great sympathy with the Indian Government, and proposals had been made from both sides of the House that assistance should be given to the Indian Exchequer to enable them to tide over the temporary difficulties against which they were now contending. He did not think that they needed that assistance. He believed the Indian Government would manage to struggle on, provided they got fair play and were protected from Motions of this kind, which he was sure would not be moved if they were to apply to the English taxpayer. ["Hear, hear!"] He undertook that there should be a complete fulfilment of any contract or engagement made by the Indian Government in regard to these officers, and he would take care that the Indian Government did not get the advantage of any ambiguity of phraseology in those contracts or engagements. Therefore he thought he had the right to ask the House to protect the Indian Government from this Motion, which he should characterise as one of the most unjustifiable raids ever made upon the Indian Exchequer.

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said that as, like his noble Friend, he had served for some years in the Army, as he had been Under Secretary for India in 1866, when the Commission was appointed, and as his service in India had given him considerable knowledge of the position and claims of the officers in question, he desired to say a few words on the Motion before the House. No doubt upon the Paper circulated those officers had a certain case; but the statements made in those Papers must be read with their context. He thought the Seconder of the Motion had put his case on too high a ground. It was not necessary to accuse the Members of the Government and the successive officials who had borne the responsibility of administering the affairs of India, of having robbed these officers. Strong expressions of that kind were only resorted to when there was a weak case. To say that when men obtained places on the Treasury Bench they lost all sense of right and wrong was ridiculous. At any rate, he, having sat on the Treasury Bench, had not been sensible of having had any such loss. He, for his part, thought that the officers of the Old East India Company were treated with great liberality. If any error had been committed at all, it was an error of liberality. If the letter of the law held out the promise of expectation to those officers that they would be entitled to the succession of Colonels' allowances when they had reached thirty-eight years' service, they ought to have those allowances. He could not get over the fact, admitted by these officers themselves, that they had agreed that their appointments were to be subject to any alteration that might be decided on. His hon. Friends who moved and seconded the Motion said that that did not cover the alterations in the conditions of pay and service generally. That was as great an assumption on the one side as on the other. He had looked into this question as long ago as 1866, and he thought then, as he had thought ever since, that it left the Government of India free to make such conditions for these officers' services, after they had organised the service of the Army, as seemed proper to them. He did not think a primâ facie case had been made out for an inquiry by Select Committee, and a Select Committee of that House ought not to be appointed unless such a primâ facie case were made out. ["Hear, hear!"]

*GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham) said a good many of his constituents believed that a grievance existed. These officers did not wish to have their case prejudged; what they wished was to put the matter before an impartial tribunal. The noble Lord seemed to have jumped to the conclusion that this Committee was going to report against him, and talked about the burden which would be cast on the finances of India. The whole question appeared to him to be a very difficult and complicated one, and he did not intend to enter into it, but what he did contend was that these officers were entitled to have their case examined by an impartial and entirely unbiassed tribunal. ["Hear, hear!"] Secretaries of State for India had always taken advice and been coached by officers of a rival corps—the Staff Corps. They all knew that rivalries and jealousies existed in all Services—in the Army, the Navy, and even, he was told, in the Church. These unfortunate officers could control no votes, but they had passed their lives in India, and served their country gallantly, and therefore he hoped that hon. Members would vote for this impartial inquiry by a Committee of the House.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said he felt bound to intervene on two grounds. He wished to express his entire approval of the policy which was being pursued by the noble Lord, as well as his admiration for the masterly speech which he had addressed to the House on that occasion. ["Hear, hear!"] He must also say a word or two on the speech of the hon. Member for Hull, who seconded this Motion. He did not think that speech ought to pass unnoticed. He had always demurred in that House to reflections being made on the Government of India, especially when they were groundless. In this country we understood the criticisms which opposing political parties passed upon each other, and upon Ministers with reference to party politics. But when a responsible Member of that House, and especially a Member occupying the position relating to India which the Member for Hull did, distinctly told the House of Commons and the people of this country that the Government of India, as represented in that House by those Ministers whom Her Majesty had been pleased to appoint Secretary of State for India were absolutely devoid of impartiality, that they prejudged every case that came before them, that they were entirely in the hands of their military officials, that if they objected to an inquiry there was something in the background, and that they had jockeyed officers out of their just claims, he could only say that that long catalogue of charges against responsible Ministers in that House was one which he was not anxious to see reprinted in the Press of India. He felt that it was his duty to enter a strong protest against applying that language to the present Government or to their predecessors, or to the Government of the Viceroy in India, or to the Indian Council in Whitehall—["hear, hear!"]—for they were all involved in the sweeping criticisms of the hon. Member.

Sir H. SEYMOUR KING said he did not intend to convey anything of the kind. He had listened with utter amazement to the right hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, he had said that the right hon. Gentleman and his noble Friend had come to a decision which they believed to be perfectly accurate. He himself, however, honestly took the view that the matter should be submitted to an impartial tribunal.

*Sir H. FOWLER said he was quite willing to believe that his hon. Friend did not intend to convey what he said, but he had quoted verbatim the words which had been used. He demurred altogether to the statement that this matter had been prejudged. He believed it had been investigated by five Secretaries of State—the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Kimberley, Lord Cross, the noble Lord opposite, and himself. The hon. Member stated that he approached this question with impartiality, and with a conscientious desire to do his duty. Did the hon. Member suppose that Secretaries of State were incapable of impartiality, or were devoid of conscience or regard for duty? He did not think the hon. Member meant that, but unfortunately he implied it, and he, therefore, wished to enter his protest. After the clear statement of the noble Lord, he was not going into the merits; he would only recall to the House what was the crux of the situation. The same advantages were asked for by officers who had joined the service after the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown, as was granted by the Act of 1858 to the old East Indian Army by the East Indian Government. The hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down said that there was a rivalry between the Staff Corps and other branches of the service, but these gentlemen got all that the Staff Corps got, and were put in precisely the same position. He disagreed totally with the construction which had been put upon the dispatch of 1864, but the real point on which the controversy rested was whether these officers were entitled under that dispatch to what, with all respect to the present Prime Minister, he would venture to call the disastrous concession subsequently made in 1866, by which Colonels' allowances were given to the whole of the officers who were in the old East India Company's service. His opinion was that if the Indian Government had been disposed to press the point they might have been able to deprive the officers on the General List of any Colonels' allowances, but they had been given an establishment of 13. So far as his knowledge extended, he considered the Indian Government had treated their servants with the amplest generosity, and he thought they were treated with special liberality in 1882. There had been, he might almost say, a dozen inquiries, and the matter had been fully and carefully considered, and if the House appointed a Select Committee to inquire further into it, it would avowedly be a declaration of opinion on the part of the House that injustice had been done, and that the case had not been properly investigated. In the event of the Committee reporting in favour of granting these allowances, the House would find itself in a difficult position, for the Government of India was the sole judge of the charges that were to be imposed on the revenues of India. The Secretary of State had but one vote in the Council, and that House had by Standing Orders adapted to the case of East Indian expenditure the same rule as existed with reference to Imperial expenditure—namely, that no proposal could be made for any charge upon the revenues of this country or of India unless it was previously recommended by the Crown—in other words, by the Government of the day. He thought that groundless charges had been made against the Government of India with reference to their expenditure; but it would be a very heavy additional charge if this application was granted, for the noble Lord was quite right in saying that they would have to open the case of every man who had retired and taken a pension. He thought it would be a serious thing if the House of Commons, in spite of the deliberate opinion of the Viceroy and his Council, in spite of the deliberate opinion of five or six Secretaries of State and their Councils, recommended a charge on the revenues of India which every one of those authorities thought ought not to be put upon them, and a burden they should not be called upon to bear. As far as the military question was concerned, surely the hon. Member would not impute to three such distinguished officers as Sir Donald Stewart, Sir Archibald Alison, and General Gordon any jealous rivalries, or a desire to do injustice to any part of the military service. They would be the first to recognise even shadowy claims, if they rested on justice. In the face of their advice, not only to the Secretary of State, but to the Government of the day, and with all respect to the House of Commons, he thought it would be an unwise thing for the House to take a step indicating a desire to reverse the policy which had been pursued, and implying that the Government, both in India and at home, had been influenced by improper motives, or had prejudiced the case, had not acted impartially, and had not done what he himself knew they intended to do, and what the Secretary for India, speaking quite as much for the Opposition side of the House as for his own, said that the Government would always do—whatever was fair and just to the distinguished men who, whether in a civil or military capacity, had served the Crown in the Government of India. [Cheers.]

The House divided:—Ayes, 55; Noes, 174.—(Division List, No. 187.)

IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN MANUFACTURED GOODS.

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) rose to call attention to the great increase in the importation of foreign manufactured goods into the United Kingdom, and the consequent loss of employment to the working classes in Great Britain and Ireland; and to move:—

> "That fully manufactured goods brought into this country from any foreign country should pay a toll for the benefit of the British labour thereby displaced of Ten pounds per centum ad valorem, and partly manufactured goods a Customs toll of half that amount, and that the proceeds should be applied in forming the nucleus of a national fund for the granting of weekly pensions to deserving and necessitous persons over 65 pears of age incapacitated from earning a livelihood by sickness or infirmity, or otherwise utilised for the benefit of British trade and labour."

The hon. Member said the Motion which stood in his name appeared very formidable upon the Paper. It was, however, extremely simple. He laid it before the House not only as representing a manufacturing constituency, but also in the hope of applying a solution to the difficult problem of how to provide old age pensions for the industrial classes—a problem in which the whole Unionist Party was interested. To show that the Motion was not framed in the selfish interest of the manufacturing or artisan class, it would be seconded by his hon. Friend the Member for West Wilts, who represented a purely agricultural constituency. It was not necessary that he should say more by way of introduction. But if the House would permit him he would make good the preamble of the Resolution. To do so he would have to transgress the sound unwritten rule as to the avoidance of statistics. But he hoped for the kind indulgence of hon. Members, as in no other way could the point in issue be proved. Material of an authentic character was fortunately not lacking. There were first of all the Returns moved for by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in 1882, when a private Member inclined to protection; upon Foreign Trade, Revenue, etc., between 1854 and 1880, and which were known generally as Mr. Ritchie's Returns; and then the Tables of British Trade and Production between 1854 and 1895, presented last year; and then the very able memorandum of February last of Sir Courtenay Boyle to the President of the Board of Trade. He was bound to acknowledge the general fairness of the Reports and Tables furnished by Sir Courtenay Boyle and Sir R. Giffen. One saw them driven by force of fact into admissions which they vainly tried to explain away. He would confine himself as strictly as possible to proving what the Resolution truly called "the great increase in the importation of foreign manufactured goods." The Secretary to the Board of Trade said, p. 18:—

> "The import of articles called manufactured into the United Kingdom has enormously increased, viz., from £53,000,000 in 1883 to £81,000,000 in 1896."

No one could say in the face of such figures that Lord Rosebery was exaggerating when he said last year, "these are grave and striking facts." But they became much more grave if one looked further back still, as one was assuredly entitled to do, namely, to the commencement of the time when this country, once the workshop of the world, began to become the dumping ground for the surplus products of foreign states—often sold under cost price, thanks to foreign bounties and duties. The total importation of manufactured goods in 1855 was only just over £9,000,000. Since then it had gone up year after year, until now it was nine times that amount. Indeed, this was below the mark, for the Trade and Navigation Returns for the 12 months ending March 31 showed not only that £82,348,337 worth of manufactured articles were imported, but also £15,148,000 worth of miscellaneous articles, mostly manufactured, and one million worth through the Parcel Post—not far short, therefore, of 100 millions worth, or tenfold the importation of manufactures 40 years ago. Whence, then, came this greatly increased competition? Sir Courtenay Boyle said:—

> "Our imports from France have increased sensibly, notwithstanding its slow increase of population, and the increase on analysis is found to be largely an increase of the imports of silk and woollen manufactures. Our exports to France, on the other hand, show a sensible decline."

Then as to Germany. The Secretary to the Board of Trade said, p. 27:—

> "It is evident that the Returns relating to imports from Germany do not tell us the whole story of our trade with that country. It is impossible, therefore, to make up anything like an exact account of the real progress of our imports from Germany."

He explained this on page 13, when he said,

> "A not inconsiderable amount of our import trade with Germany is carried on through Dutch and Belgian ports, and appears in our official Returns as imports from Holland or Belgium."

The hon. Member was afraid that the President of the Board of Trade, in trying recently to reassure the Wolverhampton Chamber of Commerce as to German competition, had quite forgotten this caution from the Permanent Secretary of his Department. The only fair thing then was to consider the imports from Germany, Holland, and Belgium as a whole, and for brevity's sake they might well include France. The total average annual importation from Germany, Holland, Belgium, and France, was in the quinquennial period 1855-59 but £34,000,000, while in 1895 it was £120,000,000, an increase of £86,000,000, while our export to those four countries only rose in the same period from £25,000,000 to £49,000,000, an increase of but £24,000,000. The House would recollect the passage he had just quoted from the latest Board of Trade memorandum, as to the increase of manufactured imports from France, and the difficulty of precision as to Germany. Sir Courtenay Boyle said, however, "There is a distinct increase in our imports from Germany," and it was necessary to read this, not only by the light of every man's visual experience, and by the candid statements of Mr. Williams' striking book, entitled "Made in Germany," which everyone should read, but also by the official table, that the exports of manufactured articles from Germany had risen from

£83,000,000 in 1880 to £109,000,000 in 1895. In the latter year, moreover, France exported £76,000,000 worth of manufactured goods, and the United States £38,000,000 worth, or nearly double the export of 15 years before, and the greater part came here, to this the only free market. The main lines of the imports of manufactures into this country were soon stated. In 1896 we imported £3,500,000 worth of cotton manufactures, £2,740,000 worth of glass manufactures, £4,500,000 worth of iron manufactures, £7,500,000 worth of leather manufactures, besides nearly £3,000,000 worth of boots, shoes, and gloves, £3,000,000 worth of paper, £16,700,000 worth of silk manufactures (or a third more than the whole export of British and Irish produce to France in 1895, on which we paid nearly 40,000,000 francs of duty), £12,500,000 worth of woollen manufactures, £1,500,000 worth of watches and clocks. In all, £57,500,000 worth of principal manufactured articles, and £23,500,000 worth of other articles. In face of such facts as these, with an increase of some twelve millions in the population since 1855, to provide with wages for food, it was evident that there had been, as the Resolution declared, a displacement of British and Irish labour. If these articles were required for consumption in this country, the making of them in the United Kingdom would have given increased employment to tens of thousands of our own countrymen. We exported in 1896 £208,000,000 worth of articles manufactured or partly manufactured, compared to £231,000,000 worth in 1872, and nearly £215,000,000 worth in 1882, when the population was five millions less. He might be pardoned perhaps for referring particularly to the staple industry of Sheffield—hardware and cutlery. In 1857 we exported £4,000,000 worth of hardware and cutlery, and in 1895 only £1,800,000 worth. Although there had been a slight increase in 1896, surely this decline showed there was something wrong. The latest conclusions and statistics of the Board of Trade would have amply justified this Motion being brought forward, even if his duty to his constituents had not necessitated it. Sir Courtenay Boyle said of Germany and the United States, that

> "they are travelling upwards more rapidly than we—that they, and, to some extent, France also, are certain to increase their rate of upward movement, and their competition with us in neutral markets, and even in our home markets, will become increasingly serious. Every year will add to their required capital and skill, and they will have larger and larger additions to their population to draw upon."

The recent memorandum went on to say:

> "It is necessary more than ever that attention should be given in the United Kingdom to the business of manufacturing for export. The change of conditions must be recognised, and we can scarcely expect to maintain our past undoubted pre-eminence without strenuous effort. The question is one which interests consumers as well as producers, labour as well as capital."

The proposition he submitted was that this wholesale importation of foreign manufactures or the products of foreign labour was never dreamt of by Mr. Cobden, Mr. Bright, and the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton the respected Father of this House, when they prevailed on Parliament to open the British market to all the world, without tax or toll. No nation had followed that example, notwithstanding positive assurances to the contrary. Only that afternoon the Secretary of State for the Colonies talked about the Free Trade system of this country. There was no Free Trade system in this country. The system they had was one of free imports without reciprocity, without that interchange which was the very basis of trade. "Free Trade" was an absolute misnomer as applied to their present fiscal system. What they then said, with the Secretary of the Board of Trade, was, "the change of conditions must be recognised." The State should therefore charge a toll for the use of the British market in the same way that every municipal or market owner in the country did on the produce entering it, and that this sum should be applied for the benefit of the working and industrial classes. It was these classes who suffered. Capital knew no frontier, but labour, saddled with family ties and burdens, must stay at home. He readily admitted that a portion of the manufactured imports were really raw materials for manufacturing processes in this country. These partly manufactured goods, or imports, giving some employment to British labour, being placed on the market for sale, should, in his opinion, pay a lower toll than fully manufactured goods imported ready for immediate sale and employing no English labour. He would only detain the House a few minutes more in a brief examination of the amount such a toll might place in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and of how he might use it for the benefit of the working and industrial classes. The later Returns did not discriminate between fully manufactured and partly manufactured imports—why he could not conceive. But assuming their proportion to be much the same as formerly, about one-fourth of the whole would be partly manufactured. Let him put the partly manufactured at three-eighths of the whole, and take the manufactured imports at only £80,000,000 instead of £100,000,000, as they would be found to be under a stricter Customs system. A 10 per cent. toll on £50,000,000 worth of fully manufactured imports would yield £5,000,000, and 5 per cent. on £30,000,000 of partly manufactured imports would yield £1,500,000 a year, or together £6,500,000. From the Returns moved for in 1891 by the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), it would appear that in round numbers 245,000 persons—88,000 males and 157,000 females—over 65 years of age were in receipt of permanent poor law relief, and of these about one-third were ending their days in the workhouse. Double those figures and they had 500,000 persons out of the 1,800,000 over 65 years of age in the country who could establish a claim to pension as being necessitous. This £6,500,000 would give 5s. a week to every one of these 500,000 persons. But even less than one-third of the amount—namely, £2,000,000 would give 5s. a week to over 150,000 persons, or all the women over 65 now upon the rates, leaving in such case £4,500,000 to be applied to other purposes. It might be objected that the income would be fluctuating and of uncertain amount. But if in one year it was less than another, it was certain that the prosperity and employment in the country would be greater, and the demand on the fund less. Compared to the great gain of such grants and the aid they would afford to the rates, the toll would not be felt in the least. Indeed, as our exporters to the United States, France, and other countries nearly always had to deliver their goods duty free, taking the duties off their profits and the wages of their workmen, the foreigner would probably pay it all. In any case, as our Customs Revenue was over £21,000,000 a year, very little less than in 1845, despite boasted free trade, and larger than that of any other country in Europe, this small addition would be felt by no one, home competition would prevent any advance in price. The Resolution favoured British possessions, and, if there was one thing more satisfactory than another in Sir Courtenay Boyle's Report, it was the admission of the Board of Trade that

> "the greater proportion of the trade in British possessions everywhere is carried on with the United Kingdom."

["Hear, hear!"] The important step just taken in this direction by the Dominion of Canada—[cheers]—could not fail not only to be very gratefully received in this country, but also to contribute very materially to the development of trade within the Empire. ["Hear, hear!"] This would assist them more than anything else, he believed, to meet the fierce competition with which they were assailed in markets throughout the world. The Leader of the House would doubtless recollect having once said that it might be desirable to bring foreign nations to a better frame of mind by taxing their manufactures. He submitted that this was an opportunity for bringing them to that better frame of mind, and that in doing it they would confer a signal benefit upon the working and industrial classes of the country. It was absolutely incumbent upon them—and he said it as the representative of a working class and manufacturing constituency, and as knowing something of the feelings of working men in all parts of the country—to do something at the present time to defend the home market. If he were told that retaliation was to be feared, he replied, Was it possible for any foreign country to raise their duties against us higher than they were now? Every country on the face of the earth had done or was doing everything it possibly could to injure British trade, and really the best way, as Lord Salisbury himself had said, to obtain better terms from foreign countries was to show that we were not fast wedded to any system, but that we would meet increased duties by higher duties here; that, in short, we would trade with those who trade with us. He begged to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

*Captain CHALONER (Wilts, Westbury), in seconding the Resolution, observed that he represented a constituency which had suffered by unfair competition from foreign countries. The town of Trowbridge at one time took the lead in the cloth trade industry of the West of England, whereas now, whenever he went there, he had nothing to deplore but empty mills, distressed industry, and hands loafing about the street corners, unable to obtain work. He submitted that every thousand pounds sent abroad necessarily meant that the money was spent in employing foreign labour, whilst the circulation of it was taken away from this country, and consequently led to the employment of a smaller number of English hands. Why was it we were unable to remedy those evils, which not even Free Traders would deny? It was because we went into the fight with our hands tied and unarmed. We endeavoured to compete with foreign nations whilst we had no weapon to use against them, they being armed with all the tariffs directed against our goods. What would be the results if the Resolution were accepted? It must mean either reciprocity of trade with foreign Powers by making them come to terms, or else it would mean imposing a tariff upon their goods, with one or other of two effects—either to keep out their manufactured goods altogether, in which case there would be an enormous increase in the number of men employed in this country and increased prosperity, or else, if they accepted the tariff and still imported their goods, it would mean that in using our "shop" they would be paying for the use of it. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed the acceptance of the Resolution also would help the Government to redeem many pledges they made previous to the election by doing something in the direction of affording old-age pensions for the benefit of the working classes displaced by the present unfair competition.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): My hon. Friends have spoken in defence of the Resolution with great ability and with evident conviction, and they have taken the view that it is in the interests of the working classes and of the manufacturers, and I gather, also in the interests of the agriculture of this country, that some such Resolution should be recorded in our journals and acted upon by the Government of the day. I confess it was with a certain amount of surprise that I heard my hon. and gallant Friend who seconded the Resolution take the view that this Resolution is a Resolution in favour of agriculture. I can imagine a form of protection, a duty upon foreign imports, which would undoubtedly be an advantage to the classes engaged in the production of imported articles into this country. I have no doubt that those engaged in growing wheat and barley would gain by a duty on the importation of wheat and barley; but what I confess I wholly fail to see is how a duty on the articles consumed, among others by the classes engaged in agriculture, could benefit those classes when no corresponding duty is placed on those articles which the agricultural classes themselves produce. [Opposition cheers.] How it could be an advantage to my hon. Friend's constituents that they should pay more for all the articles they import from foreign countries, while they have no advantage in the things they produce in the home market, I confess passes my ingenuity to conceive. [Opposition cheers.] The truth is that this Resolution is advanced by the Mover of it on the ground that it is not for the benefit of the agricultural interest, but for the benefit of the great manufacturing interest of the country; and it is from that point of view I will say a few words. My hon. Friend has lamented that England no longer maintains its relative position among the manufacturing communities of the world and he brought forward statistics of undoubted authenticity to prove the fact. The fact is an undeniable one. Most unquestionably two or three generations ago England stood in solitary grandeur, so to speak, as the great manufacturing country, and now it sees other countries following its steps, and in their turn learning the lesson we have ourselves learnt in the past. I do not deny that in some respects and from some points of view this new condition of things is of the nature of a national danger, and that the facts to which my hon. Friend calls attention deserves most careful watching by those responsible for the conduct of our affairs. But do not let the House take the view that it is a pure and absolute loss, as my hon. Friend supposes, either that other countries should manufacture or that we should import. [Cheers.] It is an advantage to us that we should be able to import goods, and my hon. Friend's ideal, to which he appears to point, is that the nation which imports nothing but raw material and pays for it in manufactured goods is really not the ideal to which we should look as giving the greatest development to our own manufactures. Now, my hon. Friend compares exports and imports in his statement; but the two things are corelative. You cannot import unless you pay for the goods, and you can only pay for your imports by your exports. [Cheers.] [Mr. JAMES LOWTHER interrupted with a remark which could not be heard in the Reporters' Gallery.] My right hon. Friend says that we are £200,000,000 short. Let it be what you please, what my right hon. Friend means is that what in the old-fashioned discussion was called the balance of trade is against us, and we import more than we export. How does that come about? It comes about, as every one knows, largely from the fact that we are great creditors of other nations. They have to pay their debts to us, and they cannot pay in specie. International trade is a question of barter, and their debts to us are paid in goods. That is a fact which accounts for the fact to which my right hon. Friend has just called attention. If it were not so there would be an accumulating balance of unpaid debts against us, an accumulation of indebtedness which would rapidly bring us to the verge of bankruptcy. I therefore assume that the debts between the foreigners and this country are roughly balanced in the course of each year, and if that is so, you cannot expect to increase your exports, as my right hon. Friend rightly desires to increase them, without at the same time increasing those imports for which the exports are in effect the payment. The truth is, speaking for myself, I am not afraid of imports into this country. What I am afraid of is the competition in neutral markets between the manufactures of this country and the manufactures of other countries. [Cheers.] I think that if my hon. Friend will give full consideration to that aspect of the question, he will probably see that the best way of bringing our manufactures up to the standard at which they can compete effectively in the neutral markets is not to surround or swaddle them in protective tariffs. [Opposition cheers.] These observations are restricted to the neutral markets. If we are to compete with Germany, France, or America, or any other nation in neutral markets, the way to produce that most desirable result is not to do anything which would take off the competitive strain, without which very little good is done in the world, either in the realm of manufactures or in any other region of human endeavour. Let me say in passing, that there was one point of my hon. Friend's speech which I did not quite follow. He told us that no rise in prices would, in his judgment, follow from the imposition of protective duties. If no rise in price is to ensue from protective duties, it seems hard at first sight to see how manufacturers in this country are to profit by the imposition of the duty. The reason our manufacturers naturally desire that there should be a protective duty is that the price should rise. That is their object, and if that object does not succeed, then one of the main instruments by which my hon. Friend proposes to improve their position would lose all its efficiency. One other point occurs to me in connection with what fell from both speakers. They have stated that the imposition of the duties would produce prosperity, diminish the number of unemployed, and prevent strikes. I profoundly distrust most arguments on economic subjects drawn from what is crudely but inaccurately described as experience. I think it is worth my hon. Friend's consideration whether in the countries which have adopted the system he advocates there are fewer unemployed, fewer strikes, or a greater amount of prosperity. I confess that the indications I have obtained on the subject do not lead me to accept this as a fact, though I do not say that it should not be taken into account. There would be a certain absurdity in the House adopting at the present time a Resolution for fostering manufactures, when, broadly speaking, our manufactures are in a specially flourishing condition—["No!"]—and not in adopting a Resolution at the same time dealing with others which are not in a flourishing condition. If we are to tamper with our traditional fiscal system it ought to be, I should think, in the direction of protecting that which is obviously not flourishing, rather than in the direction of protecting that which is flourishing. While I see all these difficulties in the way of my hon. Friend's contention, and these defects in the reasoning and the arguments, do not let it be supposed that I think our present fiscal system is one wholly without its own difficulties and dangers. I believe my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given expression to this view before. I think that the very small taxable area with which we now have to deal is a chronic difficulty, or may be a chronic difficulty in certain very easily foreseen contingencies, which would make the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer an extremely embarrassing one; and, while much is to be said for the extreme simplicity of our fiscal system, it has its own difficulties and dangers which it would be folly of the House to ignore. We have gained greatly by the simplification of the system. Let us remember that while we have gained we have put ourselves in a difficult and delicate position, and that we shall find it hard to raise new revenue if new revenue is required; and it is possible that some modification of the existing system may from that point of view at no distant date be absolutely necessary. The second weakness in our present fiscal system is one to which my hon. Friend referred, and in respect of which he quoted an election answer which I gave to an election question in 1892. To the terms of that answer I absolutely adhere. I have always felt, and I now feel, that we have, one after another, deprived ourselves of every weapon by which we may negotiate with foreign Powers in regard to that matter. I regret that, as a person who thinks that immense advantage can be derived by this country from the system of free trade, because it is evident that by negotiations we were enabled in times past, if not to break down altogether, at all events to modify in our favour those hostile tariffs which foreign nations raised against us. [Mr. Mundella made an observation which could not be heard in the Gallery.] The right hon. Gentleman is a Member of the Cobden Club, and is necessarily a great admirer of Cobden. I do not say that under the commercial treaty with France, which was Cobden's work, there was anything really given up by this country, but I do say that the possibility of giving it up—in other words, the possibility of modifying our tariff to suit the tariff of France did obtain from France modifications of her tariff in our favour from which we derived some benefit. ["Hear, hear!"] But that process cannot go on now, because now we have nothing to negotiate with. [Mr. Mundella: "It was wine mainly that was the weapon;" and several hon. Members: "Silk!"] The right hon. Member makes all the concession I desire. He has admitted that the power of this country to manipulate its tariffs is a weapon that can be used in negotiations with foreign countries. But I say that now it is scarcely possible—I do not say absolutely impossible—for us to find any further modification which may be used for that diplomatic purpose. When I said in the answer which my hon. Friend has quoted that I could conceive circumstances in which it would be necessary for us to take up as a diplomatic weapon, a diplomatic threat, some form of fiscal charge upon foreign manufactures, I only said what every wise man would say did not go beyond what might be the commercial necessities of this country. Of course, I grant that that is practically an act of fiscal warfare, and fiscal warfare, like every other warfare, is a very costly operation. But war is an operation which, however costly, nations must sometimes engage in, and I can conceive circumstances in which we should be perfectly justified in undergoing the cost and risk which must inevitably accompany any such diplomatic contest as that to which I refer. I have now, I think, covered all the ground of the Resolution excepting the latter part of it dealing with old age pensions. On that subject it would be obviously premature for me to say anything. We have always entertained the hope that something substantial might be done by this House of Commons in aid of the deserving poor—["hear, hear!"]—and when that is done no doubt it will throw upon those who are responsible for the finances of this country the necessity of finding means whereby to meet any charge that may, as a consequence of such a plan, be imposed upon our finances. But as it would be premature and inexpedient for me to say one word either with regard to the suggested plan of aiding the aged poor or with regard to the financial methods by which the plan could be carried out, I hope my hon. Friend will feel that I am not discourteous to him if I put aside that portion of the Resolution. I do not think that this discussion has been without advantage, but I am not of opinion that much would be gained by asking the House to go to a division upon the Resolution. I could not support it, and the Government could not support it. I hope that in the circumstances my hon. Friend will be content with the opportunity which has been given him of so ably expressing the views which he has long held and strenuously supported, and that now that the discussion has run its course he will not require the House to divide. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. J. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston) said that he took great interest in this question, because he represented a constituency where trade had been materially affected by the force of foreign competition. The increasing importation of manufactured goods was such as must cause everyone considerable uneasiness. In his constituency he saw every day the evil results of the pressure of foreign competition. The cheap boot trade, for example, was one class of industry which had been entirely driven out by the stress of Belgian competition. That meant that numbers of men were forced to seek employment as casual labourers at the docks and elsewhere. They swelled the ranks of the unemployed. In the very heart of his constituency there were foreign depôts and American depôts competing with English manufacturers on their own ground. Surely it would not be unfair to make foreigners pay some toll for the privilege which was extended to them? In New South Wales, a Free Trade Colony, a charge in the shape of a tax on profits was imposed upon foreign manufactured goods sold in the Colony. The income tax of this country was being paid more and more by mere agents, by shopkeepers, buyers and sellers of goods. When they saw one native industry after another falling away, it was high time to take this subject into serious consideration. He was a disciple of the hon. Member for Sheffield, having been converted to his views by hard facts. He felt sure that the spread of education was opening the eyes of the people. They were beginning to realise where the shoe pinched, and it would not be very long before constituencies like his own would ask that some sort of protection should be given to their industries.

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT said that, after the declaration of the Leader of the House, that the question of old age pensions would receive careful consideration, and after the opportunity which he had had of giving the Chancellor of the Exchequer a hint as to the source whence the right hon. Gentleman might obtain the necessary funds, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion put, and negatived.

PIERS AND HARBOURS.

*MR. EDWIN LAWRENCE (Cornwall, Truro) had given notice of the following Motion:—

> "That, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of trade and communication by sea between places on the coasts of England and Wales, and with a view to the protection and development of sea fisheries and the safety of the persons engaged in them, it is desirable that a Departmental Committee be appointed to inquire in what way and to what extent the existing provisions of piers and harbours on those coasts should be improved."

He said that the subject to which his Motion referred had occupied the attention of the House on many occasions in the last 20 years. In 1884 a Committee recommended, after a most exhaustive inquiry, the provision of more piers and harbours of refuge, in the interests, chiefly, of the fishermen of this country. He knew that the Members of the Government responsible for the spending departments would call attention to the Treasury Minute of 1861, by which it was laid down that money might be advanced for this purpose by way of loan; but what was the use of loans to poor fishermen who could not raise the interest and had no security to give? ["Hear, hear!"] This was not a small matter. It concerned a very large number of fishermen on the coasts, and if the fishermen had the power of combining, or could exercise the power of the vote, it would be impossible for any Government long to resist their just demands.

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY (WALES) BILL.

On the consideration of this Bill,

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said that he did not intend to oppose the Bill, but he desired to say that last year a similar Bill had been opposed by the Welsh Members on the ground that it authorised the imposition of special railway rates which applied more particularly to the Carnarvon branch of the line. The present Measure, however, had been so altered that it applied only to the County of Flint, and he believed that another Bill dealing with the other Welsh counties would be introduced subsequently. In consequence of the alteration that had been made in the Measure, he no longer desired to oppose it. He thought that it was desirable that he should make this statement in explanation of his action in withdrawing his opposition to the Measure.

Bill, as amended, considered; to be Read the Third time.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SERVICE FRANCHISE BILL.

MR. HARRY MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) moved "That this Bill be now Read a Second time." He said that probably it would be for the convenience of the House that he should state the circumstances which had induced the promoters of the Measure to bring it forward. The object of the Bill was to prevent a large number of deserving persons from being deprived of the Parliamentary franchise which they had hitherto enjoyed under the provisions of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, in consequence of the interpretation which had been placed upon that Act by a Judgment of the Court of Appeal, pronounced at the end of 1896. The effect of that judgment would be that at the next registration of the Parliamentary voters in September, nearly the whole of the police, and thousands of shop assistants and other persons who resided upon the premises of their employers, would be deprived of the franchise. Down to the end of 1896 such persons were generally regarded as being entitled to the franchise by virtue of their service residence, but by the Judgment of the Court of Appeal it was held that policemen occupying cubicles in police barracks were not entitled to the franchise, on the ground that the partitions separating the cubicles did not reach the ceiling, that the cubicles were lighted by electric lights which lighted two or more of them, and that they were heated by a general system of hot-water pipes. That decision had been held to apply to the cases of shop assistants and other persons occupying similar cubicles. The effect of the Judgment of the Court of Appeal would be to enable large employers of labour to confer upon or to withhold the franchise from those in their employment by means of architectural devices. ["Hear, hear!"] Lord Justice Rigby, who differed from the majority of the Court of Appeal, in the case of "Clutterbuck v. Taylor," in the course of his Judgment said:—

> "The question raised is, whether the appellant was an inhabitant occupier of a dwelling-house within the meaning of Section 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1884. He was, as I understood the statement made in the case, allowed, as a matter of fact, to occupy the cubicle during the whole of the qualifying period without interference. He had the key of the cubicle; and I gather that, when he was on night duty, he did in fact use it for sleeping in during the day; and, when he was on day duty, he used it for sleeping in at night. He used it, therefore, for sleeping in as occasion required; and it appears also that he was in fact allowed to take meals in it if he liked. Section 3 of the Representation of the People Act 1884 says that 'where a man himself inhabits any dwelling-house by virtue of any office, service, or employment he shall be deemed, for the purposes of this Act, to be an inhabitant occupier of such dwelling-house as a tenant.' In this case it cannot be said that the cubicle was inhabited by any superior under whom the appellant served. Assuming for the moment that the cubicle was a 'dwelling-house' for the purposes of the Act, it appears to me that the appellant was an inhabitant occupier during the qualifying period. I cannot see that the existence of a power in the Chief Constable to make regulations or restrictions with regard to the use of the dwelling-house by the appellant has anything to do with the franchise given by the section, provided that he did in fact inhabit. The section says nothing about the nature of the inhabitancy, or as to how far it may or may not be subject to restrictions; and I think we ought to be very slow to insert limitations which the Legislature has not expressly mentioned. There are, we know, cases of large establishments where a great number of persons are employed, who inhabit parts of a house by virtue of their employment, and who, in so inhabiting, must be subject to such directions as their masters choose to give. I cannot see that such directions, if actually given, could affect the existence of the franchise given by the section; but the mere fact that there was power to give directions which were not given appears to me to be quite beside the question. The truth is, that the service franchise is essentially different from the other occupation franchises. It is not given in respect of any property in or right in respect of the place occupied. It is assumed by the section that there is no such right. The person who occupies by virtue of his employment is not even in the position of a tenant at will. He is not a tenant at all, but simply a person who is permitted by his master to occupy, subject to such regulations, if any, as may be made by his master. Then, was the appellant the inhabitant occupier of a 'dwelling-house'? At first sight one would be disposed to say that this cubicle was a very different thing from a dwelling-house. But it is obvious that the extraordinary sense in which the term 'dwelling-house' is used in the Acts relating to the franchise includes things that are totally different from anything which would, in the ordinary use of language, be called a dwelling-house, because any part of a house will suffice if occupied as required by the Act. It need not be any particular part of a house, and it does not matter how small it may be. The extent or nature of the part occupied is immaterial so long as it is occupied separately as a dwelling. This cubicle was none the less part of the whole police barrack, because it was part of a room in it. Whether it was what would ordinarily be calling a dwelling-house is not the question. It was said that it shared the air and light common to the whole room. The Legislature appears to me to have dealt with that very consideration in Section 5 of the Parliamentary and Municipal Registration Act 1878, which provides that, 'For the purpose of any of the Acts referred to in this section, where an occupier is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of any part of a house, that part shall not be deemed to be occupied otherwise than separately, by reason only that the occupier is entitled to the joint use of some other part.' I can see no reason for cutting down the generality of those words, which appear to me to meet the contention based upon the enjoyment by the appellant of air and light common to the room of which his cubicle formed a part. In this case the appellant had the key of his cubicle without any interference during the whole of the qualifying period. It is true that, if occasion had arisen, his superior officer might have insisted on going into his cubicle for any purpose; but, as a matter of fact, he appears never to have done so. So that, if the appellant occupied this cubicle at all—and it appears to me clear that he did—his occupation was in fact separate. Then, did he occupy it as a dwelling? I cannot find anything in the section which provides that, in order to come within it, the occupier must occupy with all the powers which a person would have in respect of a dwelling-house in the ordinary sense. The test, as it appears to me, is the nature of the occupation which has in fact taken place, not whether the occupier might have been ordered to occupy in a different manner. Considerable light is thrown on this question by the previous part of Section 5, which provides that 'in and for the purposes of the Reform Act 1832, and the Municipal Corporations Act, the terms "house, warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other building" shall include any part of a house where that part is separately occupied for the purpose of any trade, business, or profession.' If part of a house is in fact separately occupied for the purpose of a trade, business, or profession, the section says that part of a house is to be deemed to be a house. . . . I think the term 'dwelling' is used in the section as an antithesis to 'trade, business, or profession.' I concede that there appears to have been an extensive power of interference with the use by the appellant of this cubicle. But, in order that a man may be an inhabitant occupier, he is not bound to show a title to occupy. He may have been a trespasser, or a tenant at will, or merely on sufferance. The only question is, did he in fact occupy as an inhabitant? With regard to that question whether the subject matter of the occupation was a dwelling-house, I concede, again, that the appellant had not the same rights as persons would have in the case of ordinary dwelling-houses. But the question appears to me to be not whether he had such rights, but whether he separately occupied part of a house as a dwelling. It seems to me that, whatever the powers of the Chief Constable may have been, these cubicles were the dwellings of these policemen, who occupied them by sleeping in them from day to day throughout the qualifying period. I cannot see that using them as sleeping places is anything else but occupying them as dwellings, although the occupants may not have been entitled to use them for other purposes for which people ordinarily use their dwellings. So far as it goes, I think sleeping in a place is using it as a dwelling. In point of fact, these policemen appear to have been allowed, if they liked, to take meals in their cubicles, and not to have been interfered with in the use of them in any way. There was, no doubt, the power of interfering with them; but I do not think that the existence of such a power is made by the Legislature the test. In my opinion, the question is whether they did in fact occupy part of a house as a dwelling, not whether they had a right to occupy in the same manner as that in which a person occupies a 'dwelling-house' in the ordinary sense of the term."

This Measure, which he submitted was an urgent one, did not propose to create any new franchise. It affected only service voters, and, instead of complicating and confusing the existing law, would only more clearly define what was the obvious intention of Parliament in passing the Representation of the People Act. ["Hear, hear!"] He begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) proposed to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to add instead thereof the words

"this House refuses to add to the confusion and complexity of our present franchise system, which, in its opinion, can be remedied only by the adoption of a single, simple and uniform franchise."

The right hon. Baronet congratulated the hon Member who had just sat down upon his very moderate and able speech in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, but did not think that it covered the whole of the case. It was a gross exaggeration of fact to say that recent decisions of the Court of Appeal affected the votes of nearly the whole police of the country. The overwhelming body of the police were not affected, and would not be affected, by this Bill. The class, however, whom it was, he believed, especially desired to benefit by the provisions was the class of shop assistants. If he thought that the Bill was likely to lead to the permanent benefit of shop assistants, and not to do more harm than good, he would be willing to support it. He had been honoured by some confidence on the part of shop assistants, and had charge of a Measure which they were promoting. But, as a matter of fact, this Bill was open to the most dangerous frauds. He spoke with some knowledge, because he was the author of the Act of 1878 and was concerned in the Act of 1884, in which the service franchise was established, having had to do with the drawing of the clause with the present Lord James and Lord Thring. Parliament had this reason to be cautious—that the lodger franchise, also intended for a very special purpose, had been fraudulently abused to the most extraordinary extent. This Bill was open to fraud on a large scale, because it might mean the creation of hundreds of fraudulent votes in a single building.

Sir J. B. MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): Does the right hon. Baronet attribute fraud to the employers?

*Sir C. DILKE said he was prepared to prove his statement. The service franchise was first suggested by Mr. Trevelyan, now Sir G. Trevelyan, in the interests of the Scotch shepherds and shepherds in the north of England—that was to say, persons who had virtually been in substantial and bonâ fide occupation in the same sense in which other agricultural labourers of their district were; but it was seen that the same principle which applied to them applied to coachmen who inhabited stables in London. The only classes who were in the mind of Parliament at the time it passed the service franchise clause were those two classes. He was willing to give the franchise to hundreds of people if they only inhabited a bed in a dormitory, but there were other classes who, if the distinction hitherto drawn was to be maintained, were more entitled to the franchise because more within the view hitherto taken by Parliament. Beds in a dormitory very often were occupied by those who were not heads of a family, who were the sons of other persons who had the vote, but there were hundreds of persons who were heads of families and persons of considerable substance who would remain excluded under this Bill. And this class he would sooner enfranchise first. He was in favour of franchise for all. He believed the support of narrow, niggling franchise points to which the Conservative Party had unfortunately become committed was a mistake, and that even in their own party interest it would be far better to go for a large and generous Measure of enfranchisement, apart from any consideration of bricks and mortar. Coming to the details of the Bill, the first words of the first Section—"Where a man inhabits any dwelling-house"—governed the whole Bill, and yet they were absolutely contradicted by the latter portion. A cubicle was held by the Judges not to be any dwelling-house separately inhabited, and the Bill which attempted to upset those decisions began with the words "where a man inhabits"—the very thing the Courts had said the man did not do. Later on the promoters attempted to say that in spite of that fact the man was to have the vote in certain circumstances, and then they came to the dangerous word "compartment," which would certainly raise more difficulties than the House of Commons attempted to remove by the Act of 1878. The Bill simply "chucked" the difficulty at the heads of the Judges, and left it to the Judges to create a new difficulty in defining what a "compartment" of a room should be. Another most dangerous point was the statement that the vote should be conferred "notwithstanding any control, restrictions, conditions, or disabilities whatsoever imposed on the occupation." He submitted that it was dangerous to introduce those particular words in so sweeping a form. What might be those "conditions"? They might involve, among other things, the absolute reversal of working habits or negative the ordinary presumption of the law. Again, it would be a case of throwing the difficulty at the heads of the Judges for solution, and they would be expected to define what it was the "conditions" were to admit and what it was they were to exclude. The hon. Member said that the Bill was not intended to open the door for the creation of a new class of voters. It would, however, have that effect. Take the marked tendency in some counties for the agricultural labourer living in a regular cottage to be superseded by gangs living for long periods in barns. In Surrey, whence market produce was sent in carts to London, the work was more and more passing into the hands of fixed gangs, who lived in barns, where they were housed by the farmer. Under this Bill a new class of franchise would be created, because the farmer would practically be clothed with the power to make voters of the men he wished, and to refrain from doing so in the case of other men whose names he did not wish to appear on the service franchise form. Hon. Gentlemen were creating this artificial franchise in favour of one special and selected class. It was, indeed, class legislation. [Cheers.] The sole persons who would be specially benefited were those who lived under conditions of service, and he maintained that the conferring of the suggested privilege would increase the sense of unfairness and dissatisfaction with the present arrangements of the franchise and registration laws which now existed so widely. Why should hon. Members seek to tinker with the registration and franchise laws? They surely did not believe that to spread the franchise widely in this country would be unsafe for the Conservative Party? The technicalities and trivialities of our present system resulted in the enormous cost of our election and registration methods, and this costly feature was not only peculiar to this country, but it was a scandal. This Bill would increase that cost, because through it the promoters would increase the necessity for legal assistance and for appeals to the Courts. He asked the House to take the view that, whether we followed New Zealand and South Australia in adopting adult suffrage, or the example of other States in adopting manhood suffrage, one or other of those two simple bases of franchise was the only means of getting rid of the costly and fraudulent technicalities which this Bill would, if passed, only aggravate and not remedy. [Cheers.] He concluded by moving his Amendment.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.) supported the right hon. Baronet's Amendment. He was a believer in the universal franchise. It seemed to him to be very illogical that they should have women voting in local affairs, and yet deprived of the Parliamentary vote. This view was unpopular at present in the country, but he did not believe it would remain long unpopular. The Bill would be likely to lead to gerrymandering, and would increase the complexity of the register. It would also have a tendency to increase the expenses of both political parties, because the list of objections to claims would be greatly enlarged. If the Bill were passed, every coffee-house or eating-house proprietor, every publican in his constituency, would be able to create a number of votes in view of an approaching election. [Sir J. B. MAPLE pointed out that those whom the Bill would enfranchise must have occupied their premises for the qualifying period.] The hon. Member did not seem to contemplate cases of fraud, which would certainly arise. The Bill would have curious consequences. Supposing four shop assistants occupied one room of the value of 5s. a week, they would all get the franchise, while their fathers, men of much riper experience, might be paying only 3s. 9d. a week for their respective dwellings, and in that case would not have a vote. Then any one of these four young men who married and went to live elsewhere would cease to be a voter unless he could pay 4s. rent. His rent might be 3s. 9d., but he would not have a vote, although he had had one when occupying with three other people a room of the rental value of 5s., or 1s. 3d. per head. The effect of the Bill upon the position of the police would be very small. He represented probably more metropolitan policemen than did any other Member, and in his constituency only about a dozen constables out of 400 or 500 lived in barracks. The Bill said that a man might be entitled to be registered and to vote, notwithstanding that the dwelling house which he occupied was merely a compartment of a room. He wished to know whether it was intended that painted lines on the floor of a room, separating it into squares, should constitute compartments conferring the franchise? The Measure would enfranchise men who had but little stake in the country—men who paid a rent of about 2s. a week, and who were for the most part engaged in the lowest class of labour.

SIR J. B. MAPLE thought it very strange that advocates of the principle of universal suffrage should adduce all the arguments they could muster against an attempt to extend the operation of the franchise. The two hon. Members who had preceded him were trying to prevent a lot of honest men who ought to have the vote from being put upon the register. The object of the Bill was to simplify the law, and to benefit men whom Mr. Gladstone in 1884 intended to enfranchise. Mr. Gladstone explained at the time that it was intended to create a new service franchise, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman then wished that all those who were equal in position to agricultural labourers should have the advantage of the franchise. He was ashamed to hear the right hon. Baronet say that if this Bill were passed it would lead to fraud. The right hon. Baronet attributed to all heads of establishments that they would fraudulently return the names of men as having been 12 months in their employ. He was sorry indeed that any one should consider the class with which he had been identified all his life such a despicable and dishonest set of men. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman, who professed to go in for universal suffrage, was now proceeding to do all he could to prevent a large number of men, who would have a vote if there were universal suffrage, from getting the franchise, because he thought it would lead to fraud. Many men who were entitled to the vote were now disfranchised through the uncertainty of the law as to the service franchise, and they must remain without the vote unless this Bill were passed. The right hon. Baronet was himself in power in 1884 and 1885, with the right hon. Gentleman who formerly represented Midlothian. They then had the opportunity to bring in a universal suffrage Bill if they had wished to do so, but they did not do it. They brought in a Bill giving the service franchise, and the present Bill was an endeavour to make that Bill clear. ["Hear, hear!"] As regarded the question of control, in nearly every single instance of the service franchise the occupier was under some control. He had a place in the country on which cottages were occupied by gardeners and others, and they were not allowed to smoke in their cottages. According to Lord Esher, if any such condition existed, those men were not entitled to the vote. Lord Esher laid it down clearly that no man was entitled to the service franchise unless he could go in and out when he liked, and do what he pleased in the house. Lord Justice Lopes agreed with Lord Esher in that, but Lord Justice Rigby as thoroughly disagreed, and pointed out that it was intended that a man in the enjoyment of a cubicle was entitled to a vote. This Bill was drafted simply to give effect to Lord Justice Rigby's view. ["Hear, hear!"] The promoters of the Bill did not want to create a new vote, but simply to make the service franchise clear and explicit. He contended that Lord Esher's decision made it possible for any man who so wished to destroy the power of anyone in his service to vote, because he disagreed with him in politics, and to do so by merely putting restrictions on his occupancy. He knew well that there were a great many other people who ought to have the franchise, and he and his friends were quite willing that they should have it, but that was no reason why this Bill should not pass. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped that the right hon. Baronet would withdraw his opposition, and that the Bill would pass without a division, for he believed it would be equally to the advantage of Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House. He could not imagine that hon. Gentlemen opposite could really wish to prevent the passing of a Bill which, instead of creating difficulties, would simplify the law and prevent from being disqualified men whom the law intended should be qualified. He trusted the Measure would be allowed to pass rapidly, so that before the next registrations took place, the revising barristers would know whom to put on the registers. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. REGINALD McKENNA (Monmouth, N.) observed that the Bill enabled employers at pleasure to enfranchise and disfranchise the service occupants. The Bill gave employers greater power, so far as structural alterations were concerned, to enfranchise and disfranchise, but it took away the power to disfranchise merely by imposing restrictions. He was surprised that so little caution had been exercised in this constitutional change by hon. Members opposite. ["Hear, hear!"] Had such a Measure as this been put forward by what he might call some of the more uncontrolled intellects on the Opposition side of the House, it would not have created so much matter of surprise. ["Hear, hear!" and a laugh.] Hon. Members opposite, who had maintained constitutional reforms and rights, must be aware upon what principles the franchise existed in this country at the present time. The franchise was primarily based on property qualification. Subsequently they had got a household occupation qualification. They had also got a lodger qualification, which was in its nature a property qualification, inasmuch as a £10 rateable value was essential.

AN HON. MEMBER: I beg, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

After the usual interval MR. SPEAKER counted, and found that there was just a quorum.

Sir J. B. Maple.

*MR. McKENNA, resuming, said, when the household franchise was established, Parliament placed it under the restriction of the words "inhabitant occupiers of dwelling houses," and it was upon the construction of those words that the qualification existed. What was to be done under this Bill? It was proposed that the limitation imposed by these words should be taken away in a single case, and in a single case only. Take the case of undergraduates. They were not under this Bill to be entitled to have a vote. They had no vote now, as they were not regarded as inhabitant occupiers. It was the same with certain Canons, who were disqualified because they were only in residence for a certain period of the year. Then as to the lodger franchise, Parliament took care to impose restrictions. Only two persons could be on the register in respect to a single dwelling. What was the reason? The reason was that Parliament feared they might get a number of lodger applications over which the revising barrister could have no control. If that care had not been taken, they might have 20 or 30 voters in one house, and there could be no certainty that they were properly qualified under the law. He hoped the hon. Member for Dulwich would understand that he had not and could not have any reason to charge any person connected with the Bill with being likely to promote any of the evils he was about to suggest. He knew that the hon. Member for Dulwich, a large employer of labour, was undoubtedly absolutely fair in the treatment of his men, and would scorn to impose any political restrictions upon any one of them. The House would, however, remember that under this new service franchise the overseer would not be able to enter the names himself. The overseer would have to accept the list of the persons from the employer of labour, and would have absolutely no check upon the list. Certain names would be handed to the overseer, and he would not be able to say whether any particular person had occupied any particular compartment or not; he would have no means of identifying the persons, or of saying whether anyone was qualified or disqualified. With the list before him, what power had the overseer or the political agent of either party of objecting to any person? The revising barrister, the overseer, and the political agents must be entirely in the hands of the employer for the purpose of determining whether particular persons were or were not qualified.

SIR J. B. MAPLE asked if the hon. Gentleman was aware that the names of everybody entitled to vote were published?

*MR. MCKENNA said he was aware that the names would be published on the church doors, but the hon. Gentleman knew as well as he that the number of persons who studied the list was so limited that as a protection such publication was practically worthless. As a matter of fact, the names put on the list by the overseers were in 99 cases out of 100 accepted without objection. In this particular case there would be no means of inquiry; it would not be possible for the registration agent of either party to object to any particular name. That was a very serious danger, and an overwhelming reason why the enfranchisement of these persons could not be done by the method proposed by the Bill, but should be done by the method suggested by the right hon. Baronet, viz., by an enfranchisement of all persons. The next objection he had to the Measure was that undeniably it placed the power of enfranchising and disfranchising in the hands of employers of labour by the slightest of structural alterations. The merest dividing line would constitute a compartment in the room. Let the House consider for one moment the absolute control which such a provision gave to the employer of labour to enfranchise and disfranchise. Why was it that only one person might vote now in respect to a single dwelling? Because only one person could be identified as the ratepayer. Parliament had been overwhelmingly cautious in the past. Had Parliament been mistaken? If it had been mistaken let the precautions be removed for all persons, and not merely for that class of persons who were in service, and bound to obey the orders of their employers. Why should such a far-reaching Measure as this be allowed by the Government to be brought forward by private Members on a Wednesday afternoon without the Government expressing, at any rate, so far, any responsibility for it? Registration reform was part of the programme of the responsible leaders of the Conservative Party at the last Election. Registration reform introduced by the Government would be of a more comprehensive character than this Bill. Let hon. Members opposite rely with confidence upon the electoral promises of their own leaders. [Cries of "No, no!"] It seemed that hon. Gentlemen opposite shared with him some doubt as to the reliability that was to be placed on the electoral promises of the occupants of the Government Bench. It had been shown that this Measure was partial in its character, and that although it remedied an evil it remedied that evil in the wrong way. Another objection he had to the Measure as it now stood was that under the construction which the Courts had put on the term "inhabits," a person who inhabited a house must sleep in it. It did not appear that under this Bill it was necessary for a person to sleep in the compartment he occupied. Under the circumstances, he trusted the promoters of the Bill would withdraw the Measure, and rely with confidence upon the leaders of the Conservative Party introducing a proper Measure in due time.

On the return of Mr. Speaker after the usual interval,

MR. ROBERT ASCROFT (Oldham) said he thought that the House was justified in refusing to agree to the suggestion which had been made that they should wait until the Government thought proper to bring in a scheme dealing with registration and with redistribution. There was a great grievance and injustice to a large number of ratepayers which they desired to redress. That grievance had not been caused by the action of hon. Members on that side of the House, but by a decision of the Court of Appeal. There was no doubt that hundreds of ratepayers who had been placed on the register, and who had exercised their right to vote, would at the next election be removed from the list, and be denied all right of taking their part in the legislation of this country. He therefore protested against the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean that this was an attempt to place on the register a new class of voters. He submitted that the House would be neglecting its duty did it not follow up the suggestions and arguments which had been given by hon. Members on that side. The hon. Member for Monmouth had said that an injustice was also done to Undergraduates. That was not an objection to this Bill, but it would be a good ground for the hon. Member, when they got into Committee, to move an Amendment for the purpose of extending the Bill in that direction. They did not want to alter the existing registration law, but to carry out what were the intentions of Parliament when the Act was passed. With respect to the argument of the hon. and gallant Member for Newington, he thought that if only 12 police constables would be affected in his constituency that was a good reason for the Bill, and not a reason for its withdrawal. He believed those who had listened to the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean must think that in reality he was not an opponent but a supporter of the Bill, and he would be much surprised if the right hon. Gentleman did not go into the Lobby with them. The object of the Bill was good, and questions of draftsmanship and wording were matters for the Committee stage. The right hon. Gentleman desired a broad and generous measure of franchise, and hon. Members on that side of the House would be equally willing to make such a scheme effective, coupled no doubt with a redistribution scheme. The Bill did not attempt to create a new class of voters. They were told that farmers might bring down a large number of hop-pickers and put them into barns, thus making voters of them, but this difficulty had not been experienced in the past. The hon. Member for Monmouth said something about Undergraduates at Oxford and about Canons, but surely that was a rather ridiculous objection to raise to a Measure of this description. Then they were told that they were tinkering with the franchise. In fact, from beginning to end of the speeches opposite it came simply to this—the great scheme of enfranchisement must be dealt with once for all. He felt perfectly certain that Members opposite could not oppose this Bill seriously and conscientiously, and he did not think the hon. Member would care to go before his constituents on the ground that he opposed a Bill intended to remove a grievance and to remedy an injustice. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he had come down to the House rather inclined to oppose the Bill, but he had an open mind. The speeches of his right hon. Friend (Sir C. Dilke) and his hon. Friend (Mr. McKenna) had converted him. He should support the Bill. [Ministerial cheers.] He quite agreed with his hon. Friend. There were no doubt a great many defects in the Bill, but they might be considered in Committee. ["Hear, hear!"] But there never had been a Bill which was not capable of amendment. ["Hear, hear!"] He was glad to get that admission, seeing that the most important Bill of the Session passed through the House without any amendment at all. [Cheers and laughter.] He had listened very carefully to the speeches of his right hon. Friend and his hon. Friend. He had come to the conclusion that the Bill was a good Bill, and he could not refrain from saying a word in its favour. The only thing they were entitled to ask, he thought, was that when the Bill got into Committee, the promoters of it would accept bonâ fide amendments, and that there should be no attempt to rush the Bill through the House. He had not the least doubt that it would then be a useful Bill. His great reason for supporting the Bill was that it was an extension of the franchise. The hon. Member for Monmouth said there were other inequalities, but that was no answer to this Bill. Did the hon. Member bring in a Bill to redress those grievances? But surely the fact that other classes had grievances was no reason why they should withhold the franchise from an important and deserving class. ["Hear, hear!"] They could not get sweeping reforms carried. This was the way in which the franchise had been extended from time to time. They must go on by degrees. [Cheers.]

*CAPTAIN JESSEL (St. Pancras, S.) trusted the House would excuse him in making a few observations on this Bill, as the interests of his constituents were largely affected. He could assure hon. Members opposite that there was no intention by this Bill to make large constitutional reforms. It was simply a Bill to give back the rights and privileges granted by the Act of 1884, and which had been taken away by the recent decision of the Court of Appeal.

He thought that the police, the members of the fire brigade and soldiers had been deprived of the franchise contrary to the intention of Parliament. The hon. Member who had just sat down had told them that if they were willing to accept bonâ fide Amendments there would be no objection to the Bill. They would be quite ready to accept them; and speaking on behalf of the promoters of the Bill, he said they should be only too glad to accept any Amendment which would not strike at the principle of the Bill. Their sole object was to remedy a grievance. ["Hear, hear!"]

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) said that, in common with many others, he took the same view as the hon. Member for Carnarvon of the speeches delivered by the Members for the Forest of Dean and North Monmouth. The hon. Member said he had come to the House rather intending to oppose the Bill, but with an open mind; and that he had been converted by the speches referred to. They were told that they ought not to remedy a small matter of this kind without going in for a large and comprehensive measure. It was all very well to take up this high and dry attitude, but he thought it would be difficult to get those who were suffering from the grievance to share that view. Those who had opposed the Bill had forgotten the provision contained in the Act of 1878. Under that Act the Legislature had recognised the separate occupation of part of a house, and that must have been in the mind of the Legislature when it passed the Bill of 1884. They must take it that Parliament was looking at the sort of occupation which would confer the vote. Objection was taken on the ground that the Bill did not confer the franchise on Undergraduates and Canons, but he thought the hon. Member who raised that point overlooked what was the objection in these cases—namely, that there was no continuous 12 months' occupation. Then the hon. Member asked, Why should they not deal with the case of young colliers who took a house jointly and occupied it? This Bill professed to deal only with the case of those who inhabited dwelling-houses by virtue of their employment, and where the dwelling-house was part of the premises of the employer. If the colliers who clubbed together for the purpose of taking a house had the house divided, so that each occupied it separately, then each collier would be in possession of a dwelling-house, and would be entitled to a vote. But there was no severance in that case; therefore, he submitted that the grievance the hon. Member referred to in this matter, by reason of the Bill not being more extensive in its scope, was purely theoretical and had no relation to actual fact. The hon. Member had said that the Bill would apply only to cases where the dwelling-house consisted of a mere compartment in a room. He did not at all agree with that view. He thought the effect of the Bill was that where there was an occupation of a dwelling-house—whether it be the whole or part or a compartment in a room—such occupation, in virtue of service, was sufficient to confer the franchise, notwithstanding any conditions, restrictions, or disabilities imposed upon the occupation. He did not at all agree that the operation which relieved the occupier from the effect of the conditions or restrictions would be confined to the case where the dwelling-house occupied was merely a compartment in a room. But, after all, that was a matter for consideration in Committee, and if there was anything in that or other points raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman, it would be most fully considered. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, the hon. Member had criticised the Bill because it did not deal with the question of what constituted the inhabitancy of a dwelling-house. That was perfectly true, and, in his opinion, the framers of the Measure had been well advised in not attempting to deal with such a point. The Bill had been directed solely to removing grievances felt by many persons in consequence of a recent decision of the Court of Appeal, and to embark on the question of what constituted inhabitancy would be to raise many problems. A good deal had been said about the revolutionary character of the Bill, but what it did was in effect merely to declare the law to be as laid down by that very distinguished Judge, Lord Justice Rigby. The Bill dealt with two points. The first was whether the fact that the dwelling-house in question merely consisted of a compartment of a room, or a cubicle separated by partitions not going to the ceiling from the rest of the room, prevented its being a dwelling-house for the purpose of conferring the franchise. The majority of the Judges in the case of Clutterbuck v. Taylor held that the claimant failed in his assertion to the right of the franchise. This Bill remedied that grievance, and it put into Parliamentary language the view of Lord Justice Rigby, who held that the claimant was the occupant of a dwelling-house and was entitled to a vote, as the Franchise Acts, in referring to the expression "a dwelling-house," could not be confined to the ordinary sense of the words. The second question dealt with was that of the restrictions and conditions that were imposed upon the occupation of these cubicles by those who enjoyed them in virtue of their service. The majority of the Court, again differing from Lord Justice Rigby, held that the conditions were such that the franchise was not acquired. The Bill provided that these restrictions on occupation should not debar a man from having a vote, and, as in the previous point, merely put in Parliamentary language what Lord Justice Rigby said. Upon the whole, it appeared to him that the House would be well advised in agreeing to the Second Reading of the Measure. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) observed that he might be pardoned for speaking on this question, as the city of Derry, which he represented, had sent more cases to the Court of Appeal in Ireland relating to anomalies of the franchise than all the rest of the United Kingdom put together. It was his interest, as well as that of his constituents, to support any Measure which had for its object the extension of the franchise. But what he noticed was that when hon. Members brought forward measures of electoral reform, they were invariably designed to remove one or two anomalies which happened to tell against their own party. Their policy was to get as many of their own supporters on the register as they could, and to keep off as many supporters of the other side as possible. This Bill was obviously designed for the party advantage of the Gentlemen who brought it forward. He supported the Amendment because he ventured to think the anomalies as a whole in the electoral system were becoming such an absurdity that it was essential they should be removed by the Government in a thorough way. He could not say that the Liberal Party could claim that they, when they were in office, did deal with these questions in a thorough way. They introduced three Bills in succession, and as those Bills went on, they became less thorough. The result of the attempts made by the Liberal Leaders in the last Parliament to tinker with the electoral law only showed all the more certainly that if they were to improve the present registration laws and to get some simple system, they would have to abandon their whole elaborate system of fancy franchise and go to one of those simple and single qualifications which had been adopted by other countries. There were at the present time twelve separate qualifications under which a man might become entitled to a vote in this country, and so long as they kept up this variety of qualifications they would have, in every constituency every year, the process of fighting out claim after claim in the registration courts, at great expense to both political parties. The waste of time and money in the registration courts in every closely contested constituency in England and Ireland was one of the scandals of the time, and there was no way to remove that scandal except, he ventured to think, by giving up all these varieties of qualifications, and passing on to the policy adopted by most other countries both on the Continent of Europe and America of manhood suffrage. Once they made that step, which he suggested was what the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean desired, it would no longer be necessary to have an annual revision at all. That being the only logical outcome of their electoral difficulties, they would only make matters worse by attempting further to tinker with the present system. Every additional qualification or every slight modification of the existing qualifications they introduced would only the more increase the annual struggle in the registration courts, add to the political expenditure of both Parties, and place more difficulties in the way of poor men who wished to take part in politics. It was quite true that the Bill removed one anomaly.

It certainly was an anomaly that the fact that, with obvious benefit to themselves, those gentlemen who lived in cubicles shared the air of the whole compartment, should deprive them of the franchise. The Bill removed that absurd anomaly, but it created or perpetuated several others equally absurd. It made it the law that for the future a man who inhabited one of these cubicles, and had no further control over the means of ingress and of egress, should have a vote if he was a servant and had an occupation as a servant, but that he should not have a vote if he paid for it as a tenant. That he thought was an absurd anomaly. It was an absurdity that they should confer a franchise upon the man who paid nothing for his cubicle, and deny it to the man who paid for his cubicle. It might be said that this objection was frivolous; but, as a matter of fact, an anomaly somewhat similar, even if at all different, did occur and was a matter of constant controversy in Derry, and he believed in other places, especially in Scotland. He understood that his right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean was not opposed to men living in cubicles having votes. His right hon. Friend wished all men to have votes; but why should the man who lived in a cubicle in his master's house have a vote if his master did not reside on the premises, and yet be denied a vote if his master resided on the premises; or, why should a man who lived in a cubicle have a vote if he had it in virtue of his services, and be denied a vote if he paid for it as a tenant?

*Colonel HUGHES (Woolwich thought the supporters of this Bill would find themselves in a difficult position hereafter with regard to further extensions of the franchise. It would, for example, be impossible to maintain the lodger franchise at the present value of £10 if this Bill passed, because every person who slept in a cubicle would naturally claim the same right as a servant who slept in a cubicle. The same would apply to tenement houses. It would not be a question of occupying a room simply divided from other parts of the house, but of making half-a-dozen cubicles in each of the rooms, and each of those beds would be entitled to a vote if occupied. The statutory period of twelve months was a certain protection, no doubt, but that period might by-and-bye be shortened to six or even three months. He believed cubicles in common lodging-houses had often the same tenant for six or twelve months. If this Bill passed, he saw no way of resisting manhood suffrage. It might be said that this particular Bill remedied a grievance felt by a deserving class, but Statesmen ought to look at the matter in its general aspects. He could not see why a servant living in his master's house and sleeping in a cubicle should not have this privilege just as much as in the case of a man whose master did not live on the premises. Until he heard that his Leaders were prepared for manhood suffrage, he was bound to vote against this Bill.

Mr. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said the hon. Member who had just sat down had hit upon the weak point of the Bill. It would be felt with especial severity as far as Scotland was concerned. They would be able to enfranchise a very large proportion of farm servants—those who happened to sleep in bothies, but on the other hand, those who slept in the farm house would not come under the operation of the Bill. He hoped this was a point on which the promoters of the Bill would keep an open mind when the Bill got into Committee. As far as the principle of the Bill was concerned, he was in favour of it. He desired to see a uniform franchise. The Bill was unsatisfactory in some respects, but still it was a step in the direction he desired, and that being so, he should vote in favour of the Second Reading.

*Sir C. DILKE asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

Mr. MARKS moved: "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, Etc."

Mr. KNOX submitted that this was an objectionable course. A Franchise Bill was peculiarly one of general importance, and it was most desirable, therefore, that it should be considered in Committee of the whole House, where fair consideration could be given to all the Amendments. He appealed to the hon. Member not to press his Motion.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) supported the appeal of the hon. Member. He certainly thought that this, being a matter concerning the constitution of this House and involving an important principle of electoral law, should be discussed and decided in Committee of the whole House.

MR. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton), taking the same view, believed there was no precedent for a Bill affecting the franchise being referred to other than a Committee of the whole House. This was a simple, clear Bill, conferring manhood suffrage. It was undesirable in his judgment that the House should put any barrier between itself and the full consideration of this extremely important Bill in Committee of the House. The House had taken a step, the importance of which could not be overestimated, and he thought it was impossible for it to check itself on the course upon which it had now entered.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said that the proposal before the House involved a grave departure from the original intention of the House in setting up the Standing Committees on Law and Trade. In fact, the proposal was a flank movement in the promotion of manhood suffrage; it involved important constitutional considerations, and could not fail to have important results hereafter. He submitted to the First Lord of the Treasury that the question which the House had decided was not one which could well be disposed of without some intimation from the Government as to their view of the suggestion now before them.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) hoped that the First Lord of the Treasury would give the House some guidance on this question. He concurred in the view which had been expressed that this Bill involved a great change in the franchise, and that it was not a Measure which ought to be sent to a Standing Committee. It was a Bill the importance of which it was impossible to exaggerate, and therefore its details ought to be dealt with in Committee of the whole House. He looked upon the Bill as a Measure which embodied a great constitutional change, every stage of which should be in the hands of the House. The Standing Committees were intended to deal with commercial details and technical matters, and he objected to a precedent of this kind being established, because if the Measure passed the Standing Committee without amendment, its future conduct would be practically taken out of the control of the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said he did not assent to the description of the Bill given either by the right hon. Gentleman or by those who had spoken on the other side of the House when they described it as a great constitutional change. He did not think it was so either in form or in substance. After all, the Bill in substance only restored a practice which had been upset by a recent decision; and if that were true, it was an excess of language to say that the Bill involved a grave constitutional change. On the other hand, though he did not go the length of the right hon. Gentleman in his description, it was impossible to deny that as far as it went this was a reform—in other words, it was a Bill dealing with the franchise of the country. If the House could confine itself to this Bill alone, and say that there would never again be a large Measure dealing with the franchise question, and, therefore, that there would be no precedent set in sending the Bill to a Grand Committee, he should be inclined to assent to the suggestion to send this Bill upstairs. But he thought it would be a dangerous precedent, a dangerous example—[cheers]—to say that a Bill which, as far as it went, was a Reform Bill, was one which it was proper to deal with in a Grand Committee. The right hon. Gentleman suggested a further danger, which, though probably it would not prove to be operative, was nevertheless a possible one—the danger that the Bill might pass through the Grand Committee unchanged. On other occasions he had pointed out to the House the danger of a Rule which was quite proper as applied to proceedings in the House—that a Bill passing through Committee without amendment should not go through the Report stage—was a very dangerous Rule when applied to a Grand Committee. The House generally would feel that such a result would be a great scandal; and, therefore, he was reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, in the interests of the general conduct of the business in the House, this Bill should be retained within their control in all its stages. [" Hear, hear! "]

Mr. MARKS asked leave to withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House for To-morrow.

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (ELECTIONS) BILL.

Sir J. B. MAPLE moved, "That this Bill be now read a Second time." He said the object of the Bill was to assimilate the divisions at present existing for the School Board to the divisions now used in Parliamentary and County Council elections. The present divisions were very large. Marylebone contained nine Parliamentary divisions, with a population of nearly 600,000 and an electorate of nearly 60,000 voters. The Bill abolished the cumulative vote, which practical experience had shown to be of little or no value. It was ludicrous to preserve this system of cumulative voting. The object of the cumulative vote was to give a representation to the minority; but the Roman Catholics were the minority, and they were not represented on the School Board, so no hardship would be inflicted by the change proposed. The Bill had been discussed by all the vestries and local authorities of London, and he had received from them resolutions in its favour. It would have the effect of reducing expenses; it was not a Party Measure; it would simplify the elections enormously, and would render it possible for the representatives to pay more regard to the interests of the neighbourhood for which they were returned. In an election in West Lambeth one candidate received no less than 48,000 votes, and the constituency extended from Camberwell Green to the Crystal Palace. With such enormous constituencies, it was impossible for any candidate to make himself really appreciated when he came before the electors. The Measure followed the lines of the Redistribution Bill of 1885. It would result in a more direct representation of the people, who would feel that they were more in touch with their representatives than they were now. The only Metropolitan Member, he believed, who opposed the Bill was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, who objected to the abolition of the cumulative vote, which institution they knew was one of his pet subjects. One of the provisions of the Bill would reduce the representation of the City to two members. The City had only two Board Schools within its area, and although it contributed very largely to the expenses of the School Board he considered that the representation which the Bill would provide for it would be quite sufficient. If, however, in Committee it should be thought desirable to give the City four representatives instead of two, he would not himself oppose the Amendment. He concluded by moving that the Bill be read a Second time.

*Sir J. LUBBOCK (London University) proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." He observed that he would leave the duty of defending the interests of the City to those who represented that constituency. He, however, asked the House to bear in mind that, although it was true that there was not a large number of children or schools in the City, that part of London, nevertheless, contributed very largely towards the educational expenditure of the Metropolis. It was, therefore, in his opinion, only fair that the City should be adequately represented on the School Board. He regarded the question with which the Bill was concerned from the point of view of education, and thus viewing it he earnestly hoped that the House would not consent to read the Bill a Second time. The question of the cumulative vote was carefully inquired into in 1885 by a very strong Committee of that House. Mr. Forster himself gave evidence, and, being asked what was his opinion of the working of the cumulative vote, said, "I think the first working of the Act was much facilitated by it," and he went on to point out that Nonconformists in rural districts were mainly admitted by it. Without the cumulative vote, it would not have been easy for Roman Catholics in London to secure a representative on the School Board. He was not a Roman Catholic himself, and held that it would be a great advantage if every one in this country were a Protestant; but as many of their fellow-subjects were Roman Catholics, it was only fair that they should be represented on School Boards. In some parts of the country even members of the Church of England would have very little chance of being fairly represented if it were not for the operation of the cumulative system. It was therefore to the advantage of the Church of England, of Roman Catholics, and of Nonconformists alike to retain this system, which insured to all of them some share, at any rate, of representation upon our School Boards. Sir Francis Sandford, who was permanent Secretary of the Education Department when the Act passed, was also examined before the Committee of 1885, and gave strong evidence in favour of the present system. He said:—

> "I think it (the cumulative vote) has succeeded in securing the return of a very varied representation of all interests, which was the avowed object of its introduction."

He was then asked:—

> "Do you think it has made these differences easier to be got over or not?"

and he answered:—

> "Much easier to be got over." "Was there any extensive wish for a change?"—I never heard of any such extensive wish to get rid of the clause." "You would rather have it than not?"—"I should rather have had it than not." "Would compulsion have been more difficult?"—"Much more difficult." "You believe that the working of the cumulative vote has largely contributed to the success of the Act?"—"I think so."

Sir F. Sandford was succeeded by Mr. Cumin, who was permanent Secretary when the Committee sat. He took entirely the same view.

> "My opinion," he said, "is that it would not have been possible to have carried the Act into effect, and certainly there would have been more friction if the cumulative vote had not been in existence."

He was asked "Do you think the same argument applies now?" and he replied "I think so." Asked as to change he said, "I should prefer very much to keep to the present system." Mr. Birley, Chairman of the Manchester School Board, was asked as to the Parliamentary system of voting, and said:

> "To my mind it would not so well represent the feelings of those especially interested in education"; and Mr. Kennedy, Clerk to the School Board of Glasgow, was asked:—

> "Are the Committee, then, to conclude that you are of opinion that on the whole the cumulative vote has worked will in your constituency?"

and he answered, "Yes, I think it has." Again, Mr. Ewing, Chairman of the Dumfries School Board, being asked, "Are you satisfied with the working of the cumulative vote?" said "Quite satisfied." Strong evidence to the same effect was given by the hon. Member for Donegal, who said that in his opinion the working of the cumulative vote had had the most important effect in securing fair play on the London School Board for the Catholics. But those were not all the authorities in favour of the cumulative vote. Later still a large Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Education Acts. Their final Report was issued in 1888, and they said:—

> "We are in favour of retaining some form of proportional representation in our School Board elections, and we should be glad to see the adoption of the single transferable vote, which possesses the advantages of the cumulative vote, without the inconvenience which sometimes arises in the operation of the latter."

This was signed by Lord Cross, Cardinal Manning, the Duke of Norfolk, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, Sir Francis Sandford, Lord Harrowby, Lord Norton, Dr. Rigg, and others, while those members who signed the minority Report expressly pointed out the points on which they differed, and made no allusion to this important paragraph, so that the Commission may be said to have been unanimously of this opinion. ["Hear, hear!"] It was most important that differences of opinion, educational and religious, should be fairly represented on School Boards. That was to some extent obtained under the present system; but the security would be entirely swept away if the present Bill became law. ["Hear, hear!"] It was clear, therefore, that the weight of educational authority was in favour of the present system and against this Bill; but on general grounds also he maintained that it would be a great mistake. The most important point to be secured in any electoral system was that the majority should rule, and the second, that the minority should be heard, ["Hear, hear!"] The system proposed by the Bill failed in both. He need not occupy the time of the House in proving that if the majority was equally spread over the Metropolis they would secure all the seats, and would represent, not London, but only the majority in London. On the other hand, the system of single member seats, as proposed in the Bill, did not secure a majority of seats to a majority of votes. There was a remarkable illustration in the last Parliamentary election. On the uncontested seats the Unionists had a majority of 72 seats. But there were 481 which were contested. And what happened? In these constituencies the Home Rulers polled 25,000 votes more than the Unionists. [Opposition cheers.] That ought to have given them a majority of two seats, reducing the total Unionist majority to 70. [Opposition cheers.] As a matter of fact, though Unionists polled 25,000 fewer votes, they obtained 79 more seats. Of course they were pleased, but it must in candour be admitted that it was a mockery of representation. [Opposition cheers.] This was no isolated case. Take the last two London County Council elections. At the last the Moderates polled 12,500 more votes, but the seats were exactly equal; while in the previous election the Progressives had the same majority of votes, but it gave them a large majority of seats. He would give one more illustration. In the last Canadian election, Sir Charles Tupper's Party polled 25,000 votes more than Mr. Laurier's; and yet Mr. Laurier's secured a large majority of seats. In fact, under the system of single member seats, the result of a General Election did not depend on the number of the votes given to either side, but on the manner in which they were distributed. ["Hear, hear!"] This was no doubt the main reason why proportional representation was gradually making its way in advancing communities. It had long been in operation in Denmark; it had been adopted in Belgium. A few years ago it was introduced into the Swiss Canton of Ticino, and was found so great an improvement that it had since been adopted by the Cantons of Geneva, Neufchatel, Basle, and Zug, and seemed likely to be adopted in others also. Another objection to the Bill was that the present system tended to secure some continuity of policy. This Bill was of more importance than might at first seem to be the case, because if the change was made in London it would probably be extended elsewhere. He believed with the Education Commission that the single transferable vote was the best system; but that to abandon the cumulative vote for that of single member constituencies would be a great mistake. He thought he had shown that in the opinion of most educational authorities, including four Ministers of Education, the present system had especial value from an educational point of view, and that as regards the importance of securing a faithful representation of the electors, the Bill now before the House would be a step backwards. ["Hear, hear!"] He begged to move that the Bill be Read a Second time that day six months.

*Mr. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead) said he was strongly impressed with the urgent necessity for a redistribution of electoral areas, but not of the necessity for abolishing the cumulative vote. Speaking for his own constituency, he could say that it was absolutely essential that the large electoral areas for School Board purposes in London and the suburbs should be readjusted. In 1870 the population of Hampstead was about 25,000, and it was then not improperly made part of the constituency of Marylebone. Now the population was over 70,000, and as a population of 70,000, it seemed absurd that it should be lumped with St. John's Wood, Paddington, and other places with which Hampstead had no more connection than it had with Lambeth or Poplar. A population of 70,000 was surely entitled to a representatitve of its own on the Board. Other parts of London must be in a similar position to Hampstead. He supported the Second Reading of the Bill on the ground that it was essential that at an early date, if possible, there should be a redistribution of electoral areas in London. At present there were overlapping areas of most inconvenient size, and in many cases the people had not the slightest idea where or for whom they were voting. He acknowledged the authority of the right hon. Member for London University on the subject of proportional representation, and would not go into that subject, but he respectfully urged on the promoters of the Bill that the abolition of cumulative voting was unnecessary, and that the Bill should be confined to the redistribution of electoral areas in and around London.

Mr. STUART desired to support the Second Reading of the Bill, which was originally proposed from the Liberal side of the House, and would have been introduced into the last Parliament had its promoters been able to obtain the concurrence of hon. Members for London on the Conservative side. It was felt that it would not be possible to alter the general law of the land unless there was a consensus of opinion among hon. Members representing London constituencies on both sides. But whatever view was taken, there was no blinking the fact that the logical outcome of the Bill would be a Measure for the rest of the country. Undoubtedly there were difficulties in London which did not exist in other places, because of the want of unity in London as a whole, and the great difficulties of drawing lines of demarcation. But in Manchester, for instance, there were just as large electoral areas as in London or anywhere else. He supported this Bill, believing it to be a step towards a better electoral system for School Board elections. The basis of the argument of the right hon. Member for London University seemed to be that there should be denominational representation upon the School Boards.

*Sir J. LUBBOCK remarked that what he said was "that the majority of the electors should secure the majority of representation," and this Bill would not provide for that.

Mr. STUART thought much harm had been done to elementary education, not only by denominational strife, but by the fact that this strife had been distinctly encouraged by the system of elections to School Boards, and he would welcome the assimilation of the electoral areas for School Board elections to those for Parliamentary elections, because then the education given and its details would be more the subject of contest than the denominational character of the instruction given. He regretted that the Bill left the School Board constituencies unaltered. One of the troubles under which they laboured—and every one knew it—with respect to School Board elections, was that there was no register. The absence of this made it difficult for people to know where, when, and how they were to vote. It very much complicated elections, and he wished the Bill had introduced not only a change of area, but a definite statement as to the register on which the elections for School Boards should be taken. It was an essential reform which he regretted had not been introduced into a Bill the general character of which he approved.

*Colonel HUGHES said that he seldom troubled the House on any matter on which he had not special knowledge, and this was one on which he had special knowledge both as senior Member for the London boroughs and as a Member for six years of the London School Board. He could assure the House that the School Board electoral areas were much too large at present. Good candidates were often prevented from standing at School Board elections because of the enormous area. When he stood, 16 or 17 years ago, for the Division of Greenwich, he found it comprised four boroughs. Marylebone comprised nine boroughs, and there were many other divisions in London comprising seven boroughs. There was no identity of interest between many parts of these large divisions. But this Bill was for the alteration of the areas, and declared that the present divisions were to be abolished and new divisions created. It would, therefore, be quite within the principle of the Bill to retain cumulative voting. In 1891 he himself introduced a Bill to lessen the School Board areas and retain the cumulative vote in a modified form. At present, in some of the divisions, seven votes could be cumulated, but under his Bill, which was approved by the Government of the day, the highest cumulative vote was four, and the lowest two. Still the principle of cumulative voting was maintained, and it was done by grouping two or three boroughs, instead of seven and nine. Owing to the exigencies of legislative business at the end of the Session, his Bill was not passed. He was so disappointed that he had not introduced the Bill since. By a schedule and an alteration of the fourth Clause, the Bill now before the House could be amended to meet the views of the right hon. Member for London University, and while reducing the electoral areas, retaining the cumulative vote. In Marylebone there were 90,000 Parliamentary voters, but he presumed there were even a greater number of School Board voters. A new register of ratepayers had to be prepared for every School Board Election, and no heed was paid to the County Council or Parliamentary registers, although prepared at enormous expense. An Amendment to the effect that the County Council register should be the School Board register might with advantage be accepted. The London School Board had suggested a schedule which proposed to retain the same number of members—55—distributed in fours, threes, and twos over groups of two and three boroughs only. He was satisfied that if an hon. Member were called upon to fight nine boroughs he would hesitate at the expense. His first election cost him £600, and it was not good enough to spend so much to get on the School Board. In consequence of the large areas, they had to take those candidates who were willing to do the work of the Board, but who did not much care whether they were elected or not.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said that the speech of the hon. Member for Shoreditch must have opened the eyes of hon. Members opposite to the real character of the Bill. It was very surprising to find such a proposal emanating from the Conservative side of the House. When reading the Bill, he had such serious misgivings as to the political latitude and longitude of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of the Bill that he consulted the volume they had for their information as to whether he was there described as a Conservative, and he found he was so described. This proposal hardly harmonised with the character. Certainly the result of such a Bill as this would be that in all districts in the country where School Boards were in most active operation, the Conservative Party would immediately lose in representation. The result of the operation of the Bill would be disastrous to the Catholics in London, who were at present paying heavily for their religious opinions. They were under religious disqualifications or religious disadvantages of a pecuniary kind simply and solely because they were Catholics. There were in the Metropolis 11 districts in which members were elected. Each of those districts had some four or five representatives. Under the cumulative system of voting, the Catholic voters could concentrate their suffrages upon one or more candidates, with the result that now and again they could return a member who fully represented them, and in the great majority of cases they were able to exercise such electoral pressure that a very considerable section of the members of the School Board were only too glad to come to some kind of terms with the Catholic interest. But if each of the existing areas were divided into two or three portions, and if, instead of having power to cumulate four or five votes upon any particular candidate of choice, Catholics had only two votes to use cumulatively, their electoral power would be diminished 50 per cent. Though the cumulative vote system might be retained under the new division of areas, the effective force of the Catholic voters would be entirely dissipated. He trusted that before the House came to a decision upon the Bill, they would give full consideration to the hardships under which Catholics now suffered, and to the hardships still more grievous under which they would suffer if the Bill passed. The Government would have the determining voice in this matter, and therefore, especially in view of the loyal and consistent support in educational matters which he and his hon. Friends had given them, he could fairly appeal to them to protect the Catholic interest in this matter. If the Government should fail them, he trusted that those energies which had for some time been dormant might possibly with some justice be roused into renewed activity.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) said that the Bill would put an end to proportional representation in School Board elections, and on that ground he could not support it. Upon consideration hon.

Members must admit that on the whole the system of proportional or cumulative voting had answered exceedingly well. It had prevented, especially in the large towns, minorities from being entirely excluded from representation, with the result that, on the whole, there had been very harmonious working. The hon. and gallant Member for Greenwich told them they might vote for the Second Reading, and then introduce clauses which would alter its character. He ventured to think the hon. Member's gallantry had overcome his learning in giving that advice, for it was very doubtful whether the Speaker or the Chairman of Committees would permit such an Amendment. Not only would an injury be done to the Catholics and other religious bodies, but the elections for the School Boards would practically be converted into political elections. This would be very undesirable in the interests of education.

Mr. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) said that if the Bill had been one for revising the present divisions of London and for preserving in each division some method of securing proportional representation, much might have been said for it. But the Bill was not of that character, nor could it be so transformed. It was a Bill for dividing London into single Member districts, with the exception of the City; and the only method of election which could prevail was that followed when one Member only was to be elected. Cumulative voting was out of the question. The proposed change was a very large one if London alone were considered; but it was still larger if the whole country was taken into account; and it would be impossible to have the School Board in London elected under one system while the Boards of other large towns were elected under another system. The change would prejudicially affect not only the Roman Catholics—who under the cumulative system were able to return some members of their own communion, and powerfully to influence the elections of others—but also members of the Church of England, Secularists, Jews, and Nonconformists. In many a country parish it was the cumulative system which secured the presence of a Nonconformist on the School Board; and in Welsh parishes that system often prevented the entire Board from being exclusively composed of Nonconformists. If a variety of interests were to be represented on the School Board, and the different sections of the community were to be brought into play in the dispatch of School Board business, the present principle of election must be retained. The hon. Member for Shoreditch would not have the composition of the School Board in any degree affected by the religious opinions of the different sections of the electorate. He would not have any representation of the different sections of educational thought on the School Board. What the hon. Member would have was a great struggle over the question whether the School Board should be wholly denominational or wholly undenominational. He altogether denied the position taken up by the hon. Member for Shoreditch—that the problem of education could be considered without reference to those questions which the hon. Member wished to put aside. During the present Session Parliament had been engaged on Bills the whole principle of which was the recognition that religious education, in the minds of a considerable portion of the people, was so essential that it must be maintained. What narrowness of view, then, it was to suggest, as did the hon. Member for Shoreditch, that his particular definition of education could be imposed on the rest of the world. The hon. Member would not allow other people to have any influence on primary education unless they put aside altogether opinions which the hon. Member did not share. Society was not so constituted that these particular elements could be dispensed with. The work of education could not be efficiently discharged unless the diversity of interests was properly represented. This was not an opinion nursed in the closet—the mere dream of the philosopher or the man with a hobby. Eleven years ago a strong Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the subject. They examined the Vice President of the Council—the man who brought in the Education Act of 1870—and he said that that Act could not have worked without the cumulative system. Lord Sandford, long the permanent Secretary of the Education Department, said the same; and witnesses from all the big towns actually interested in School Board work declared that they could not have carried out the work imposed by the Education Act without the co-operation on the School Boards of members of different views and religious convictions. No doubt it was very pleasant for the hon. Member for Dulwich to reflect on the character of the Parliamentary representation of London under a system of single-member constituencies. But would the hon. Member assert that the Parliamentary representation of London at the present moment corresponded to the division of political opinion among the electors? It was notoriously not so. The London County Council was elected under a single-member system; and the constitution of that body showed at one time an enormous overplus of Progressives and at another time almost an equality, although the number of Progressive voters was the same in both cases. The electorate would not necessarily be at all truly reflected in the body elected under this Bill, as was shown by experience both in large and small areas. For example, twice in its Parliamentary history Leeds, as at present constituted, had had a majority of voters one way and a majority of members the other way. If this were a question of simply cutting down the present School Board areas something might be said for it, but, even looked at from that point of view, he did not think the proposal was one which should be accepted by the House. It was not always a disadvantage to have a large area to appeal to. It was not desirable that every area should be canvassed. It was far better to use the resources of civilisation in the way of distributing leaflets in order to bring a candidate's views before the electors than to conduct a house-to-house canvass. The experience of the School Board for London itself showed how powerful the present large areas, coupled with the system of cumulative voting, were in securing the representation of comparatively small minorities and the presence on the Board of persons of different classes. The result was that, whatever might be the defects of the London School Board, it had maintained much the same policy for the past 25 years, and there had been a continuity of action on the part of the Board which would not have happened had the Board been elected by the methods proposed in the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

The VICE PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Sir J. Gorst, Cambridge University) said there was not much time left for him to state the views of the Committee of Council on Education in regard to the Bill—[laughter]—but he would state those views in a very few words. The Committee regarded the Bill not merely as a Bill to alter the boundaries of the districts by which the School Board for London was elected, but a Bill for the abolition of cumulative voting. The Committee of Council on Education had the same opinion now in regard to cumulative voting that they had had in the days of Mr. Forster, Lord Sandford, and Sir Patrick Cuming. The experience of the past 25 years was that the Education Act could not have been so well worked, if, indeed, it had been worked at all, were it not for the protection that cumulative voting gave to minorities. ["Hear, hear!"] He would not be led into a discussion on the representation of minorities, and would express no opinion as to whether the method of election adopted in the Education Act was the most philosophic method that could be conceived; but at any rate it was one that was now in existence, and it was not one that the Education Department could recommend Parliament to alter. The opinion of all educational authorities and experts had been in favour of some method by which minorities could find their way on the School Boards, and, so far from agreeing with what had been said by the hon. Member for Shoreditch, that the abolition of cumulative voting would put an end to party spirit, he was afraid that if the Bill were passed, School Board elections would become purely party elections. ["Hear, hear!"] It was a significant circumstance, stated by the right hon. Gentleman in moving the Second Reading, that all the Radical political associations and all the Conservative political associations were in favour of the Bill. To his mind that consensus of opinion on the part of the political associations on both sides was the strongest possible condemnation of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Nothing could be more unfortunate than that the School Boards should be made arenas for political discussion. [A laugh on the Opposition side.] He supposed the hon. Member who laughed cared a great deal more for party than for education. [Cheers.] Already, as things were, party spirit prevailed a great deal too much in the discussion of education questions, and he was sure that if they made the School Boards, instead of what they were now in a great majority of cases, bodies where men of all parties, men of all religions, men of the most divergent views on questions of State policy, could act together for the benefit of education—if they were to turn the School Boards into mere party bodies, the interests of education would seriously suffer. Therefore, while the present system might be unpractical and unphilosophic in some respects, it secured on the School Boards the presence of non-party, non-denominational, and non-sectarian elements, and for that reason the Committee of Council on Education would view the abolition of cumulative voting with very great regret. [Cheers.]

WAYS AND MEANS (BUDGET).

On the Question "That the House do now adjourn,"

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked whether the Budget was to be the first Order on the following day?

Sir W. WALROND (Devon, Tiverton) said the Budget would be the first Order. The Motion which had been upon the Paper had been withdrawn for to-morrow.

Mr. KNOX asked whether the Motion could be moved on going into Committee of Ways and Means on Thursday?

Sir W. WALROND: Yes.

House Adjourned at a Quarter before Six o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 29th April 1897.

QUESTIONS.

BETTING "PLACES" (HAWKE v. DUNN).

MR. HUBERT DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will introduce a short Bill defining a "place" under the Betting Acts, 1853 and 1854, in intelligible and unmistakable words, and in accordance with the expressed intentions of the framers of the aforesaid Acts?

The HON. MEMBER also asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention had been called to the fact that, under the recent Judgment in the case of Hawke v. Dunn, any defined or undefined area may be converted into a place within the meaning of the Betting Houses Acts, should one man make, or offer to make, bets there as a matter of business; and whether, having regard to the impossibility of insuring that among a large assembly of spectators no one will bet or endeavour to bet as a matter of business, the Government will take steps to so amend the law as to enable Her Majesty's subjects to witness sports and games without the risk of finding themselves arrested, searched, and locked up?

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of Mr. Justice Hawkins, in giving the Judgment of the Divisional Court in the case of Hawke v. Dunn, that he and his learned brethren were giving effect to what they believed to be the object and intention of the Legislature in passing the Betting Acts of 1853 and 1854; (2) whether he is now in a position to state what is the effect of that judgment; and what directions in consequence of it have been given to the police; and (3) whether, considering the crime and misery which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Judges, has ensued upon the rapid increase of public professional gambling, and especially that carried on by starting or tape price bookmakers, he can hold out any hope of being able to propose legislation which, while not interfering with legitimate sport, would check and mitigate the admitted evil?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I will answer the two Questions of the hon. Member and that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Honiton Division of Devon at the same time. I am not prepared to suggest legislation in either of the directions proposed by the hon. Member. He appears to me, in the second of his Questions, to take an exaggerated view of the effect of the decision in the case Hawke v. Dunn, and I do not think that Her Majesty's subjects will be in any such danger as the hon. Member represents, or that any further legislation is necessary for their protection. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that I am advised by the Law Officers that the Judgment applies to all kinds of betting, betting on credit as well as betting for ready money, and that the Metropolitan Police, the only force directly under my control, have instructions to take proceedings against bookmakers and others who can be proved to have infringed the provisions of Section 1 of the Act of 1853. Several summonses are, in fact, now pending. As regards the evil to which he refers in the last paragraph of his Question, I am fully alive to its gravity, and, though I cannot promise anything definitely, it shall not escape my attention. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. DUNCOMBE: May I ask whether this House is in any danger of being held to be a "place" within the meaning of the Betting Acts? [Laughter.]

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: That is a question that should be addressed to the Law Officers of the Crown. ["Hear, hear!"]

POST OFFICE GRIEVANCES.

MR. DUNCOMBE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he will assent to the appointment of a Select Committee of this House to inquire into the grievances and causes of discontent amongst the major establishment of the Post Office, especially as to promotion?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): There is no information at the Post Office as to the existence of the grievances and causes of discontent referred to by the hon. Member. The great bulk of the major establishment—by which I presume is meant the clerical establishment—consists of officers of the first and second divisions who enter the service on terms common to the other Departments, and the conditions of their service were dealt with by a Royal Commission only a few years ago. If anything, the conditions of the Second Division are more favourable in a rapidly-growing Department like the Post Office than in others, and promotion is more rapid. Perhaps the hon. Member will explain to me privately what are the precise grounds of the alleged complaints, and I shall then be in a better position to judge how far any further inquiry is necessary.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY LIBRARY.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the library of the Edinburgh University is in a neglected condition, and that the busts of Royal Princes and other distinguished personages are in a discreditable state; and whether he will call upon the University Council to put the library in proper order?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): If the hon. Member alludes to the condition and numbers of the books in the library, they are preserved and added to as well as the funds at command of the University for the purpose will allow. The other matters referred to by the hon. Member will receive attention when funds are available for the purpose.

METROPOLITAN AND METROPOLITAN DISTRICT RAILWAYS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the inability of the Board of Trade to prevent overcrowding in the carriages of the Metropolitan and Metropolitan District Railways, he will consider the advisability of seeking powers in regard to railway carriages similar to those which he now possesses in the case of public conveyances in streets carrying more passengers than they are authorised to hold?

*SIR MATTHEY WHITE RIDLEY: I am afraid the matter is not one which comes within my jurisdiction.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the number of persons in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, respectively, licensed to practise vivisection, and how many of them hold certificates to dispense with anæsthetics?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The number of persons licensed at the present time in England is 145, in Scotland 52, in Wales one; the number holding the certificate dispensing with anæsthetics is, in England 86, in Scotland 30, in Wales none. The only figures in my possession as regards Ireland are those for 1895; in that year the number of licensees was six, of whom one held a certificate dispensing with anæsthetics. In giving the hon. Member these figures I may remind him that the certificate in question is never given for operations involving serious pain, but only for such operations as inoculations or hypodermic injections.

ARMY QUARTERS (REMOVAL).

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield Central): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he can inform the House of the cost of moving the furniture of officers' and sergeants' messes and quarters, and also of married soldiers' quarters, regimental libraries, etc., from station to station within the United Kingdom last year; and if the Secretary of State will consider whether a saving could be effected by furnishing such messes and quarters, and charging the occupants a rental, instead of carting about so much furniture, and cause an inquiry to be made if such a change would conduce to the comfort of officers, sergeants, and soldiers, and add materially to the mobility of the Army?

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the WAR OFFICE (Mr. Powell-Williams, Birmingham, S.): Sergeants' messes and the quarters of married soldiers are already furnished to a considerable extent; and the libraries belong to garrisons and not to regiments. As regards officers, the heavier furniture of mess-rooms and quarters is already provided by the public, so that when a regiment moves it is only the lighter furniture, with the plate, crockery, glass, and bedding which accompanies it, the bulk of the cost incurred being for the personal baggage of the officers and men. A few years ago a Committee considered the question of supplying, at the public expense, such articles of furniture or equipment as are not now so supplied; and they found that while the capital outlay would be nearly a quarter of a million, the cost of transport saved would give a most inadequate return. It is doubtful whether an uniform mess equipment would give general satisfaction.

WATERSHEDS.

Mr. WALTER HAZELL (Leicester): On behalf of the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. H. Broadhurst), I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the desirability of taking such action as may be necessary to prevent any one local authority monopolising the sources of water supply from the great watershed of the country, in order to insure equal opportunity for all communities to avail themselves of a share in this great and natural necessity of the people?

The PRESIDENT of the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Henry Chaplin, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am not aware that any local authority is seeking to monopolise the sources of water supply from the great watershed of the country, nor am I quite clear as to what watershed it is that the hon. Member refers to, but such a scheme as that referred to would require express Parliamentary powers, and I have no doubt that Parliament would give any such scheme very careful consideration before assenting to it, and would have due regard to the interests of communities other than those of the authority by whom it was proposed that the water supply should be appropriated.

MUZZLING DOGS.

Mr. DUNCOMBE: On behalf of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. A. Drucker) I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware of the fact that the majority of local bodies have not adopted the system of muzzling dogs recommended by the Departmental Committee, and also that many recognised authorities are against such compulsory muzzling; whether the said Committee took steps to ascertain the views of well-known breeders before making their Report; and if, considering the fact that muzzling entails serious inconvenience upon the owners of dogs and grave injury to the health of the animals, he will facilitate further inquiry?

*The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Walter Long, Liverpool, West Derby): I find it somewhat difficult to understand what my hon. Friend means by his first Question, inasmuch as the Departmental Committee recommended that muzzling orders should be made in future not by local, but by the central, authorities. I am aware of course that compulsory muzzling does not commend itself to everyone, but the question was fully discussed from all points of view before the Committee, who also took evidence from breeders. This being the case, I cannot assent to the suggestion that further inquiry is necessary.

WATER SUPPLY (LONDON).

Mr. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state to the House the names of the Members who will form the Royal Commission on the Water Supply of London?

Mr. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can now give the names of those who will compose the Royal Commission to inquire into the question of the purchase and regulation of the London Water Companies; and when it is his intention to introduce the Bill for strengthening and improving the position of water consumers in the Metropolis?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The names of the Members of the Royal Commission on the Water Supply of London are as follows: The Right Hon. Lord Llandaff, chairman; the Right Hon. J. W. Mellor, M.P., Sir

John Dorington, M.P., Sir G. B. Bruce, C.E., Major-General A. de Courcy Scott, R.E., Mr. A. de Bock Porter, C.B., Mr. H. W. Cripps, Q.C., and Mr. Robert Lewis. I may add, with reference to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea, that I hope to bring in a Bill dealing with the water question as soon as I see any prospect of making progress with the Measure.

MR. S. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, in view of his promise to introduce a Measure this Session for the purpose of strengthening and improving the position of the water consumers of the Metropolis, whether he is aware that the East London Waterworks Company have introduced a new condition in their latest demand notes, namely, that it will be unlawful to use water in the future for garden use except through meters; whether in his promised Measure he will make provision protecting the consumers against this prohibition of the use of water in gardens; and, if he is aware that the Company in question have admitted that no reliable water meter has yet been invented?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am informed by the Company that, owing to the excessive use and waste of water by reason of garden hose and other apparatus being employed and frequently left running day and night, the directors have given notice for determining the arrangements entered into for garden supply. The fixed charge has been abolished, and the supply for garden purposes will be furnished through meters. I must defer any statement as to the provisions of the proposed Measure until it is introduced by me. As regards the last Question, the comapny state that they are not aware that they have ever "admitted that no reliable meter has yet been invented." They also state that it is physically impossible for more water to be registered than passes through the meter, although it may happen that the whole of the water passing through the meter is not registered.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (MORAY FIRTH).

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether his attention has been called to the fishing depredations of foreign trawlers in the Moray Firth, and the proceedings which occurred in Aberdeen last Friday, when one of the trawlers in question attempted to land its cargo; (2) whether it is lawful for trawlers of foreign Powers to visit fishing grounds on our coast, which, in the interest of the fishing industry, have been closed to all trawlers of our own country; and (3) whether the Government intend to take any action in the matter?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. and gallant Member's Question is in the affirmative. As regards the remainder of his Question, as action has been taken in the Court of Session by the master of the trawler in question against the fishery authorities and myself, and the whole proceedings will consequently be submitted to judicial decision, I do not think it advisable to give any opinion in the matter.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate (1) whether he is aware that on Friday last the German trawler Alster attempted to land at Aberdeen fish caught within the prescribed limit in the Moray Firth, and was only prevented from so doing by a detachment of bluejackets and marines; and (2) whether, if the law of Scotland provides no effective civil means for enforcing the legal prohibition of the landing of such fish, he will consider the propriety of remedying the defect?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The landing of the fish referred to in the first paragraph of the Question was prevented by the crew of H.M.S. Jackal, which, as the hon. Member is aware, is at the orders of the Fishery Board, and employed in the execution of the Fishery Acts. This employment is strictly in terms of the 8th Section of the Herring Fishery Act of 1889, under which action was taken. If the crew of the Jackal had not been available I do not doubt that other and civil aid might have been made available; and I consequently am unable to see any defect in the law which requires remedy.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, as it is announced that no Manœuvre Bill will be introduced this Session, and as the ground to be acquired on Salisbury Plain is not yet available, and as he has informed the House that manœuvres are absolutely essential to secure efficiency, he will state what description of exercise it is proposed to give the troops in this country this season?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I can only answer that the military authorities propose to give the troops the best tactical exercises which the nature of the ground at their disposal will allow.

GENERAL RUSSELL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to bring in any Measure dealing with the subject this Session?

*MR. BRODRICK said that the hon. and gallant Gentleman must be perfectly aware that the authorities at the War Office were earnestly desirous of such a Measure as he indicated being passed, but that the state of public business would not allow it to be done.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether legislation will be proposed this Session, or early next Session, to enable those large manœuvres to take place in 1898, which both the Commander-in-Chief and the Government have declared to be important for the efficiency of the Army; and whether a Manœuvres Bill will be put before the Reserve Forces Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government fully recognise that the provision already made as to a large manœuvring ground on Salisbury Plain does not really exhaust all the necessities of the case, though it goes some way towards it. In these circumstances we hope to introduce a Manœuvres Bill which shall meet with general approval in all quarters of the House.

LAND COMMISSION.

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the large number of applications for the fixing of fair rents in the County Mayo, he will direct an immediate sitting of the Land Commission for that purpose?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): A list of cases from the County Mayo has only recently been disposed of; a further list containing cases from the Unions of Ballina, Killala, Belmullet, and Westport has been prepared, and will shortly be issued, and the cases on this list will, I hope, shortly be disposed of. The Executive have no power to give the direction mentioned.

CARLOWAY ROAD (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the road between Carloway and Stornoway, island of Lewis, initiated by the last Conservative Government, remains unfinished in consequence of the original grant being insufficient; and whether arrangements will be made to provide the sum required for the completion of the road?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No arrangements can at present be made in regard to the road in question.

PUBLIC DEPARTMENTS (SATURDAY HALF-HOLIDAY).

MR. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that, whereas in certain public departments a half-holiday is granted every Saturday, in others the half-holiday is on alternate Saturdays only; whether there is any regulation precluding these latter departments from granting a regular weekly half-holiday; and whether he will take steps to procure uniformity of practice in this respect throughout the service by authorising a general Saturday half-holiday?

MR. HANBURY: The rule laid down by the two great Orders in Council of 1890 for the higher and second divisions is that—

> "Officers who are required to attend seven hours a day shall be allowed a half-holiday on alternate Saturdays, provided that the heads of the Departments in which such officers are serving are satisfied that the state of public business will permit."

This rule does not debar heads of Departments from granting in their discretion occasional half-holidays at other times if the state of the work admits. The Treasury would be very unwilling to interfere with the exercise of this discretion. To modify the Orders in Council by substituting a general weekly half-holiday for the present conditional fortnightly one, would in many Departments not only seriously delay public business, but also necessitate increases of staff to deal with the work now done on Saturdays, and, therefore, the discretionary system now in force appears to be best adapted to the conditions of the Service.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Hon. G. H. Reid, Premier of New South Wales, has stated that subjects of vast importance to the Colonies and the Empire would be discussed during the visit of the Colonial Premiers to London; and whether this statement is correct; and, if so, whether there is any objection to specifying the subjects referred to?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have not seen the statement referred to. As regards the last part of the hon. Member's Question, I can only refer him to the answer given to the Question addressed to me by him on March 29. I then stated that there was no intention to hold anything in the nature of a formal Conference, but, of course, we shall be most happy to discuss, either as a whole or in an individual capacity, any question that may be raised.

MR. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any of the Irish Militia will be employed in London upon the public celebration of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee, as well as English and Scotch Militia?

*MR. BRODRICK: The arrangements are not yet definitely settled, but it is proposed that the Irish Militia shall be represented at the Jubilee.

TELEPHONE SERVICE (GLASGOW).

MR. FAITHFULL BEGG (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can now give an answer to the repeated demands by the Corporation of Glasgow and others for fresh telephone licences; and whether, in view of the number of such demands, and the confusion in the telephone service which might arise from granting them, he will consider the advisability of taking advantage of the break which occurs in the existing licences in the present year, and thus by purchase concentrate the sole control and working of the telephones in the Post Office Department.

MR. HANBURY: The Government are willing to agree to a public Inquiry, not conducted by officials of the Post Office, into the complaints made by the Corporation of Glasgow with reference to the existing telephone service, including in such Inquiry the grounds upon which the Corporation decline to allow the National Telephone Company the privilege of taking up the roadways for laying their wires. The Government have definitely decided not to purchase from the National Telephone Company, as suggested in the Question.

MR. BEGG asked what would be the constitution of the proposed Inquiry?

MR. HANBURY: It will be carried on either by a barrister or an expert.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Has the Corporation of Glasgow asked for an Inquiry?

MR. HANBURY: No; but I think in view of the complaints of the Corporation of Glasgow against the National Telephone Company, it is only fair, if they insist on those complaints, that an Inquiry should be held.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the amount of £11,971, stated in the Return [C. 8422] as the sum to which West Ham (Borough) will be entitled under the Poor School Boards Bill is approximately correct; and if not, could he state what is the approximate amount which West Ham will receive under the Bill?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The amount payable to West Ham is correctly stated for the period and on the assumptions mentioned in the Return. The Education Department have at present no later or more accurate information.

POSTMEN (CARDIFF).

Mr. J. M. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, on what scale of pay the Cardiff postmen are to be placed?

Mr. HANBURY: The Cardiff Town postmen have been placed on the scale of 18s. rising by 1s. 6d. to 28s. a week. The scale prior to 1st April was 17s. rising by 1s. to 28s.

BRITISH STEAMER STOPPED AT SYRA.

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a weekly steamer sailing under the English flag, laden with flour and bound for Canea, has been stopped at Syra?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): The British steamer Triton was stopped at Syra by the Greek authorities as mentioned in the Question, but was subsequently allowed to proceed to her destination.

IMMIGRANTS (EAST LONDON).

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the clearances recently effected in the East End of London by owners of house property, who find it to their pecuniary interest to take in large numbers of German, Polish, and Russian immigrants, whose habits and sanitary notions are not always of the highest; and whether he will take steps to secure that the local authorities shall put in force the powers they possess in respect of sanitary requirements?

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I understand that certain clearances are taking place in the neighbourhood referred to, with a view, in some cases, to the renovation or rebuilding of the tenements, but I have no information as to whether the object aimed at is the substitution of foreign immigrants for the existing tenants. The local authority assure me that they have hitherto put in force, and will continue to put in force, the sanitary powers which they possess.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, under the accelerated mail system between Dublin and Cork, the morning mail will reach Maryborough before 8.0 a.m.; and, whether arrangements could be made to deliver from Maryborough on the same day letters and newspapers at Ballyfin, which is within little more than an hour's walk?

Mr. HANBURY: The day mail train from Dublin will, on and after the 1st May, be due at Maryborough slightly before 8 a.m. As the hon. Member has already been informed, the post to and from Ballyfin works through Mountrath (not Maryborough) in connection with the night mail trains, and as the present service is performed at a loss to the revenue, a second post in the day would not be justified. Enquiry is, however, being made at Ballyfin in order to ascertain whether the residents generally would prefer the post to work in connection with the day mail instead of the night mail trains. Little advantage, if any, would, however, be gained by serving Ballyfin through Maryborough instead of through Mountrath, and as such an arrangement would be more expensive it will probably not be considered expedient to change the post town.

THAMES CONSERVANCY BYE-LAWS.

Mr. S. WOODS: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the proposed bye-law of the Thames Conservancy dealing with the manning of craft makes no provision for the manning according to tonnage of empty craft; and, whether the Board of Trade propose to alter such bye-law so as to include empty craft?

The hon. Member further asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he was aware that the new proposed bye-laws for the navigation of the River

Thames, made by the Thames Conservancy, contain no provision for the barges on the Thames being supplied with proper gear or life-saving apparatus; and, whether the Board of Trade propose to insist on the insertion of regulations dealing with this subject?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): The Conservators of the River Thames have lately submitted bye-laws to the Board of Trade for confirmation, but the time for making objections not having expired, the bye-laws have not yet been considered by the Board. I am, therefore, not able at the present moment to state what action the Board of Trade will take as regards the points raised in the Questions of the hon. Member, but I will take care that any objections or representations which may be made to the Board within the time fixed by the Act shall receive careful consideration.

TRANSVAAL (JAMESON RAID).

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, since informing the South African Republic on 25th June 1896, in reply to a demand from that Republic that Mr. Rhodes, Mr. Beit, and Mr. Rutherford Harris should be placed on their trial for their complicity in the attempted insurrection at Johannesburg, but that Her Majesty's Government could only act in this matter upon the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown and in accordance with the principles of English law, the Law Officers of the Crown have been consulted; and if so, with what result?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: A Committee of this House is now sitting to inquire into all matters connected with the raid, and pending their Report it would be premature to consider the question of proceedings.

CRETE.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether his attention has been drawn to the proclamation issued by the acting Governor General of Crete, to the effect that all Greek subjects should leave the island within 15 days; (2) whether Ismail Bey drew up an Order re-establishing the censorship of Press telegrams, but that it was withdrawn owing to the strong protest of correspondents at Canea; (3) and whether under the present conditions of the blockade and occupation of the island by the Great Powers, it is competent for any such orders to be issued by the Turkish Governor, affecting the areas under the protection of the Powers.

MR. CURZON: The attention of Her Majesty's Government was drawn to the proclamation; but, it having been agreed by the Powers that Crete, being placed under their immediate protection, must be regarded as neutral territory, Her Majesty's Government signified their opinion that the notice given by the Acting Governor General should not take effect. Her Majesty's Consul reported that he had communicated in the above sense with the Acting Governor General, who had telegraphed to the Porte for instructions, and had in the meanwhile ordered the Governors of Candia and Rethymo not to enforce the expulsion till further orders. In answer to the second paragraph, we have no information as to the censorship of Press telegrams.

MR. T. C. H. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the prohibition against landing provisions for the Cretan insurgents in Crete is still in force; and, if so, whether the prohibition extends equally to the Turkish and Greek forces in that island.

MR. CURZON: The prohibition is still in force, but, as I stated in reply to a Question in this House on the 27th instant, it is for the Admirals to decide on the exact method of its application. Our information is to the effect that in the interior there is no scarcity of food, whereas, the Turkish forces being confined to the ports are naturally dependent for provisions on supplies coming by sea, and are in some cases threatened with famine. It should be remembered that the Turkish forces are in the island with the consent of the Powers, and are solely acting for the maintenance of order and the defence of the Cretan Mussulman population, while the Greek troops are there against the express demand of the Powers for their withdrawal, and are believed to be supporting and encouraging the insurgents in their attacks.

*SIR C. DILKE: Would the right hon. Gentleman state under the circumstances as regards food blockade described by him, what is the reason for the maintenance of the food blockade?

MR. CURZON: Oh! the blockade, as the right hon. Baronet knows perfectly well, does not extend only to food, but is directed in the main, of course, against the introduction of munitions of war into the island.

*SIR C. DILKE: But, as I understand it, there is a blockade of food?

MR. CURZON: The blockade, of course, applies to all imports into the island that are likely to produce a continuation of disturbance. (Cries of "Oh" and much laughter.)

TURCO-GREEK WAR.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the assertions now being publicly made that the German Government has been supplying the Turks with munitions of war since the declaration of war by Turkey against Greece; whether he is able to state if these assertions are true; and, if so, whether such conduct is in conformity with the rules of International Law recognised by all States that claim to be civilised; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will protest to the German Government against the continuance of this conduct?

MR CURZON: No such information has reached Her Majesty's Government, and they do not attach any credence to the report.

MR. J. W. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is the fact that German Officers are at present serving in the Turkish Army, and whether it would be equally competent for English Officers to serve in the Greek Army?

*MR. BRODRICK: The Secretary of State has no information as to foreign officers serving in either the Turkish or Greek Army; but under the Foreign Enlistment Act every subject of the Queen is prohibited from taking service in the military or naval forces of a State at war with another State with which this country is at peace, unless he have Her Majesty's licence to do so.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware under those circumstances that the Government is prepared and is about to tak action against those persons who, a announced in the public papers, are enlisting in the service of the Greeks?

*MR. BRODRICK: So far as I know, the Government have no official knowledge of any persons having so enlisted.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman make inquiry?

*MR. BRODRICK: That Question should be addressed to the Foreign Office.

MR. D. H. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had received any applications for active service with the Greek forces from the 100 Members of the House who had signed the memorial to the King of Greece. [Ironical Ministerial cheers and laughter.]

[No answer was given.]

TOKAT MASSACRE.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received information supplied by Her Majesty's Consul at Tokat to the effect that the survivors of the recent massacre there are in peril of their lives, and that, in the Consul's opinion, there will be a renewal of the massacre; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay upon the Table of the House any Reports received from Vice Consul Bulman, or supplied by him to Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople?

MR. CURZON: In a telegram addressed to Sir Philip Currie some weeks ago by her Majesty's Vice Consul at Tokat, he expressed his fears of a renewal of disorders. In a Dispatch dated the 14th inst., the Vice Consul reports the Turkish population as in a general state of ferment, and that the Armenians seem convinced that the disorders will continue, and are decided to use every effort to emigrate. The steps that have since been taken by the Turkish Government are, however, of a nature to discourage any recurrence of the massacres. The Papers will be laid in due course with other Reports on Asiatic Turkey.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD FOR SCOTLAND (REPORT).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state why the Report of the Local Government Board for Scotland, which is dated October 1896, has only just been issued?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The delay in issuing the Report this year was largely due to the fact that the audit clauses of the Act of 1894, having come into operation during the year, the figures for the tables in the appendix were not procurable till the audit was completed. As was to be expected in the first year, there was some delay in having the audit carried through. It is not anticipated that similar delay will occur in future.

POST OFFICE FACILITIES (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that in the parish of Lochs, Island of Lewis, with a population of 5,000, there is no office open for the transaction of money order and savings bank business; and that, if the people of the district wish to cash a postal order or obtain a money order they have to travel to and from Stornoway, a journey of from 20 to 30 miles; and whether, in the circumstances, he will consider the advisability of establishing a money order office at one of the post offices in the Lochs district?

MR. HANBURY: As the hon. Member is, of course, aware, the District Committee of the County Council is empowered to enter into a guarantee for both telegraphic facilities and the extension of money order and savings banks business. The extension of telegraphic facilities carries with it the extension of the other facilities named, and the proposal of the hon. Member to deal with only one of them is not I think the most practical method. The question of extending these various facilities is one which should be treated as a whole, and from that point of view consideration shall be given to the claims of the district mentioned by the hon. Member.

POST OFFICE (DUBLIN).

MR. HARRY FOSTER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the post of Examiner in the Dublin Post Office has lately been given to an officer in the Controller and Accountant General's Department, General Post Office, London, over the heads of nearly 50 seniors; and could he explain in what respects all those passed over were considered unqualified for the post?

MR. HANBURY: The post of Examiner in the Dublin Post Office has lately been given to an officer in the Accountant General's Office in London. Of three vacant staff appointments in the Accountant's Office in Dublin, two were filled up by promotion of gentlemen within that office; but for the post of Examiner, the Postmaster General, much to his regret, was obliged to resort to another office, and he selected an officer from the Accountant General's Department in London, who was specially qualified for the discharge of the important duties to be performed. There were above him in that department nearly 50 officers whose salary was less than that of the vacant post in Dublin; but he was selected as the best qualified of those who were willing to undertake the duties. Not one of the officers in question stood in succession to the appointment or had any claim to it. In the judgment of the Postmaster General none of the officers in the Post Office at Dublin were qualified for the positon of Examiner; but his Grace does not consider it desirable to give a detailed explanation respecting each officer.

POSTAL FACILITIES (RUSHDEN, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE).

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that on granting the additional postal facilities to Rushden, Northamptonshire, it was made a condition that the assistant clerk whose employment was necessitated by the increased work should have a good knowledge of geography and a capacity for general sorting, but should only have a salary of 10s. a week; could he state what are the other salaries paid in the Rushden Post Office, and whether the salaries are lower than the scale of salaries in towns of similar population and postal work in the neighbourhood; and whether he will consider the desirability of increasing this salary?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General, in granting additional facilities at Rushden, did not lay down the condition in question. The assistant at the Rushden Post Office to whom the hon. Member refers is provided for under an allowance to the Sub-Postmaster, who appears to have thought it desirable in seeking for a suitable person to fill the vacancy to stipulate that the candidate should have a good knowledge of geography. The other clerks in the Rushden office are established officers of the Department, one, a man, on scale of pay ranging from 12s. to 34s. a week, and the other two, women, on a scale ranging from 10s. to 26s. a week, and these scales are not lower than those in force at offices of similar standing. The question whether the circumstances admit of the allowance to the Sub-Postmaster for an assistant being raised shall be considered.

VOLUNTARY AND BOARD SCHOOLS (GRANTS).

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he could state to the House what are the estimated amounts for the year ending 31st March 1898 of the Licence Duties given over in 1889, contribution of half the local rates in rural districts granted in 1896, and the grants to Voluntary and Board Schools made this year, all of which are handed over to local authorities in Great Britain and not in Ireland; and whether there are any, and, if so, what are the amounts of other grants in aid given in one country and not in the other.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): The estimated amount of the licence duties for 1897-98 is £3,620,000. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, the grants in aid of local expenditure borne on the votes are, as shown in the Estimates—Great Britain, £1,347,000; Ireland, £2,010,000. As to the other points on which the hon. Member desires information I will ask him to wait for the statement which I am about to make this afternoon.

DEATH FROM CAT BITE.

Mr. DUNCOMBE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the death of Mr. John Hetch, 60 years of age, who died in the Queen's Hospital, Birmingham, from the effects of a cat's bit; whether he is aware that the medical evidence proved the death to be undoubtedly the result of rabies; and whether he is prepared, either by issuing a universal muzzling order for cats, or otherwise, to guard against the danger thus shown to exist?

*Mr. LONG: Yes; my attention has been directed to the lamentable case to which my hon. Friend refers, which seems undoubtedly to have been one of hydrophobia due to the bite of a cat. I do not think that any direct action against rabies in cats is either practicable or necessary. The information in our possession goes to show that the disease is usually conveyed from dogs to cats, not vice versâ, and in fact no cases under the latter head are known to us. If, therefore, we succeed in our efforts to stamp out rabies amongst dogs in this country, the disease is not at all likely to be kept alive by means of cats. I may, perhaps, add for the assurance of owners of cats, that out of 1,075 persons treated for hydrophobia at the Pasteur Institute during the first nine months of 1895, 1,039 had been bitten by dogs and only 36 by cats.

POSTMEN (PROVINCIAL TOWNS).

Mr. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is intended that allowances hitherto received by postmen in provincial towns shall in future be regarded as part of the weekly wage, and count towards the maximum pay?

Mr. HANBURY: The hon. Member does not, I assume, refer to allowances for supervision, boots, trip and subsistence allowances or good conduct stripes, nor to merely temporary allowances for temporary work. All others will be abolished as allowances, and will be merged in the new scale of wages. Full regard will, of course, be held to the claims of existing holders of such allowances. They will enter the scale at a point equal to their previous salary and allowances combined, and whenever the maximum of the present scale, together with the allowances, exceed the maximum of the new scale, that, but no further, excess will be granted.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now in a position to state when the Bill dealing with the grant in aid of congested districts in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland will be introduced?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I cannot at present give the hon. Member any precise information on the subject.

Mr. WEIR: Is there any hope of that Bill being introduced this Session?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Yes; I hope so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS (DIVISIONS).

Mr. DUNCOMBE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the advisability of so altering Standing Order No. 30 of the House of Commons as to provide that when, in the opinion of Mr. Speaker or of the Chairman of Committees, a Division is frivolously claimed, and the names of Members challenging the decision of Mr. Speaker or of the Chairman of Committees are taken down, the names of such Members shall not appear in the Division Lists or that the record of such names shall not count as a Division; and whether, if such alteration should not appear to be advisable, he will provide that the names of Members supporting the decision of Mr. Speaker and the Chairman of Committees shall also be recorded?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I think that the rule, at all events as at present worked in the House, is certainly unsatisfactory. [Cheers.] I cannot promise my hon. Friend to bring forward in the immediate future a new Standing Order remedying the defect which I think has been shown to attach to the working of the Standing Order; but I think that the matter does deserve the attention of the House.

Mr. DUNCOMBE asked Mr. Speaker whether, in view of the words of the Standing Order No. 30, it was correct to interpret that such divisions should be counted as such, or whether it was correct to say that they were not divisions. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

*Mr. SPEAKER: The Question put by the hon. Member on the Paper called my particular attention to the terms of the Standing Order, and on consideration of them I have come to the conclusion that a vote of the House taken under that Standing Order is not a Division. [Cheers.] The Standing Order provides that the Speaker or Chairman, after calling on the Ayes and Noes to rise in their places, shall—

> "either declare the determination of the House or name Tellers for a Division, and, in case there is no Division, shall declare to the House or Committee the number of the minority who had challenged his decision, and their names shall be thereupon taken down in the House and printed with the list of Divisions."

The effect appears to me to be that it is a vote of the House, the result of which is declared from the Chair without any Division. It is a technical point, but that, I think, is the effect of the Standing Order. The Standing Order no doubt requires that the names of those who voted in the minority shall be printed with the list of Divisions, but such record ought not to be numbered or reckoned as a Division. [Cheers.] I shall give directions that in future the practice of printing it as a Division be discontinued.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENT (REPORT).

Mr. HARRY FOSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is able to state that an opportunity will be given for discussing the Report of the Tweedmouth Committee upon the position and pay of postmen?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I think my hon. Friend will have the opportunity he seeks when the Post Office Vote comes before the House.

SUPPLY (FOREIGN OFFICE VOTE).

Sir W. HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I observe that on Tuesday, in answer to a Question, the First Lord of the Treasury was good enough to say that if there was a desire expressed on this side of the House that the Foreign Office Vote should be put down at an early date, he would have no objection to the granting of that request. He also mentioned that he had fixed the business for Friday, May 14, but that there were two intervening Fridays before that date. If convenient, therefore, to the Government, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would fix Friday, May 7, for the Foreign Office Vote, so that the discussion might be taken on foreign affairs.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Of course the convenience of the Government in such matters is the convenience of the House, and the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman on such a subject necessarily meets with an immediate response from this Bench. I shall therefore regard to-morrow week as fixed for the Foreign Office Vote.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): Can my right hon. Friend tell us when the Committee stage of the Necessitous School Boards Bill will be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I am afraid that I cannot answer my noble Friend at the present moment, as uncertainty hangs over us, and we do not know how long other matters will take.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): May I ask my right hon. Friend whether the Employers' Liability Bill is to be taken on Monday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes.

NEW MEMBER MADE AFFIRMATION REQUIRED BY LAW.

Alfred Edward Pease, esquire, for the County of York, North Riding (Cleveland Division).

POST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL [H.L.].

Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Thursday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 211.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT, 1897-8. WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

[The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, in the Chair.]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.), who on rising to make his annual financial statement was received with general cheers, said: When 12 months ago it was my duty to call the attention of the Committee to the financial condition of the country, I had to place before it the record of a very prosperous year. The credit of the country had never stood so high. The revenue had never been so large; the expenditure was immense; and we had never specifically devoted so much to the reduction of the National Debt.

INCREASING NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

Financially we seemed to be on the crest of the wave, and it would have been rash in me to anticipate that we should rise even higher; and yet we have done so. [Cheers.] In spite of political circumstances in the United States, which for a time paralysed trade, in spite of unrest in South Africa, distress in India, anxieties in the East of Europe, the revival of trade which began in the summer of 1895 has been well maintained. [Cheers.] The total value of our foreign trade in the year 1895 was 702½ millions; the total value of our foreign trade in 1896 was 738 millions, an increase of 5 per cent.—to some extent in prices, but mainly in volume. I think I may say that our home trade is not less flourishing. The returns of the earnings of the railway companies, the smaller list of failures, the increased return of our Bankers' Clearing-house, especially in the provinces, labour statistics showing better employment in the skilled labour market, and last, but by no means least, the ray of hope given to the most depressed agricultural districts by a good wheat crop and higher prices for it—all, I think, tend to prove the increased prosperity of the country—[cheers]—and of that prosperity the revenue has been the best, as it is the keenest, barometer. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not like, however, to talk too much about prosperity, because I know from last Tuesday's Debate that some of my friends are not believers in it. [Laughter.] But this I do know—that during the past year our people have smoked and drunk more—[laughter]—have earned more money and paid more income tax, have written more letters, have bought and sold more property, and last, but not least, have paid more death duties—[laughter]—and therefore I hope I may be allowed, at any rate, to make this deduction, that the country is not going to the bad. ["Hear, hear!"]

REVENUE, 1896-7.

The result has been that my forecast of revenue, which amounted to £100,480,000, has been considerably exceeded. The revenue has produced £103,950,000, or an excess of £3,470,000. On this matter I have a little complaint against the right hon. Member for West Monmouthshire. He is never tired of pluming himself on his great surplus of this time last year. Well, whatever may be the credit or the discredit of having underestimated the revenue by over £5,800,000, it is his and not mine. However, I was very much obliged to him, and I still return him my thanks. But I deprecate his posing as the father of all future surpluses. [Laughter.] He told his constituents the other day that the surplus of the year just closed was due to proceedings which were taken before the present Government came into office. The right hon. Gentleman has never admitted his own obligation to the author of the income tax—[laughter, and Sir W. HARCOURT: "That was a long time ago"]—and I am afraid I must say that, whatever be the credit or discredit of the excess of revenue which I have just named, amounting to nearly £3,500,000, it rests with me and not with him. My estimate was a mistake, just as his was, and all I have to plead in extenuation is this—that my mistake was a very little one as compared with his, and that it was a mistake on the right side. I was bound to be cautious a year ago, and I am bound to be cautious still in my estimate, having regard to the storm cloud which has just broken in the East of Europe, with respect to which no man can tell how long it may last or how far it may extend. The total sum raised for the Imperial revenue last year was £112,199,000, as against £109,340,000 in 1895-96. Of the amount raised last year, £103,950,000 went to the Exchequer, an increase of £1,976,000 over the preceding year, and £8,249,000 went to the local taxation account, an increase of £883,000 over the preceding year—due, of course, mainly to the Agricultural Rating Act and kindred legislation. I will now explain the details of the revenue (£103,950,000) which went to the Exchequer last year as compared with the details of the revenue of the year 1895-96. The only fallings-off, the Committee will see, were a falling off of £95,000 in land tax, owing, of course, to the remission under the Finance Act of last year, and of £770,000 under the head of estate duty, owing, of course, to the interception of a large sum under the provisions of the Agricultural Rating and other Acts. All other heads showed an increase. The miscellaneous revenue showed an increase of £547,000, owing to greatly increased receipts from coinage and from fee and patent stamps. The gross Post Office receipts increased by £480,000, the gross telegraph receipts by £70,000, and the income tax receipts by £550,000.

Chancellor of the Exchequer.

INCOME TAX.

I have made some inquiry into the reason for that last increase. Sir Alfred Milner, whose loss to the Inland Revenue I deeply deplore—["hear, hear!"]—although all of us feel glad that with his great abilities he is serving his country in a still more prominent position, considered that a great deal of this increase in income tax was due to earlier collection. I suppose a year never passes in which the Government of the day and the authorities of Somerset House are not accused by somebody of accelerating the collection of the income tax. But they never do so, and we did not do so this year. When I asked why the collection was accelerated I was told it was because of the genial weather in January, which had opened the pockets of the taxpayers and stimulated the energies of the tax collectors. But, remembering what a January we had, I did not myself believe that could be the reason. [Laughter.] I prefer to think that the income tax payers were in a hurry to pay their taxes owing to the exceptional popularity of Her Majesty's Government. [Cheers and laughter.] I observe that that view is not shared by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and they only reflect, I dare say, the opinion of a correspondent of mine, who wrote to me saying that he had obstinately refused to pay the guinea which was due from him for armorial bearings, and that he dared me to send him to prison so long as the Government maintained their present accursed policy in Crete. [Laughter.] I shrank from the challenge, remembering that that guinea would be lost by some unfortunate county council and not by the Exchequer. [Laughter.] But, whatever be the cause, there is no doubt that the receipts from the income tax largely increased last year, and the result has been that it has yielded more per penny of the tax than it ever yielded before, and has more than made up for the remissions granted by the right hon. Gentleman opposite in 1894.

CUSTOMS REVENUE.

I am glad to say that the receipts from Customs and Excise bear equally satisfactory testimony to the condition of the people. The Exchequer receipts from Customs last year were £21,254,000—£234,000 or 1·11 per cent. above my estimate, and £498,000 or 2·4 per cent. above the Exchequer receipts of 1895-96. The estimated increase of the population in the year was only 0·8, and the Committee will see that the increase of the Customs revenue over that point is good testimony of increased spending power and comfort among the people. [Cheers.] The two groups of coffee and dried fruit showed a trifling improvement, which is, I fear, not likely to be maintained owing to the war in the East. Foreign spirits produced a net revenue of £4,316,000, or £99,000 more than in 1895-96. This was due to an increase of £125,000 in the receipts from rum, which is a most unaccountable article. It has been a favourite Customs theory that the receipts from rum went up as the thermometer went down, but considering the temperature of last winter I do not think that that theory can be maintained. I could never make out who drinks rum. Last year I thought it was my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Eastbourne—[laughter]—and his colleagues in the Navy, but he so indignantly resented the imputation that I hardly dare to suggest now that, as rum was so much cheaper last year, sailors as sensible men have preferred it to other spirits. [Laughter.] Tea has produced £3,800,000, exactly my estimate, and £54,000 more than it produced in 1895-96. Tobacco has produced £11,013,000, or £13,000 more than my estimate, and £265,000 more than in 1895-96. Wine has produced £1,295,000, or £75,000 above my estimate, and £40,000 over the net receipts of 1895-96. The increase in the receipts from wine is a novelty in recent years. I believe it is mainly due to the increased duty which was imposed some years ago by the present First Lord of the Admiralty upon sparkling wines. The taste for what is, I think, erroneously called champagne—[laughter]—is very largely increasing. The Committee may be disposed to draw a favourable omen for the future from the increased receipts in tea, tobacco, and wine, but I would point out that the increase has been very much less than the corresponding increase last year as compared with 1894-95. I then had to report an increase upon tea of £158,000—I am speaking of net receipts—and now I have only to report an increase of £54,000. I then had to report an increase on tobacco of £333,000; now the increase is only £265,000. The increase on wine was then £112,000; now it is only £40,000. It looks as if the tide was rather slackening and as if, as regards Customs revenue, we have got very near high-water mark.

EXCISE.

The same is true, but to a less extent, of Excise. The Exchequer receipts from Excise last year were £27,460,000, or £460,000 over my estimate and £660,000 over the Exchequer receipts of 1895-96; but the receipts in 1895-96 were £750,000 more than the receipts of the previous year. Last year the net receipts on beer were £10,900,000, showing an increase of £181,000. Spirits produced £16,038,000, an increase of £434,000 upon the receipts in 1895-96.

DEATH DUTIES.

I now come to the Death Duties. The total receipts from this source were £13,963,000—a small decrease as compared with the receipts of the previous year, which were £14,053,000. Of the receipts I have named, the Exchequer took £10,830,000 and the Local Taxation Accounts £3,133,000. Now, the Exchequer receipts from the Death Duties have very considerably exceeded my estimate. ["Hear, hear!"] There are three causes which I think will, at any rate, partly account for that. In the first place, I have to make a statement which I fear will be discomforting to the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He has a very favourite phrase in all his political addresses to the effect that we have taken £2,000,000 out of the pockets of the general taxpayers and have given it to the landed interest. I am not going to enter into controversial matters as to whether the landed interest has received it or not, but I am anxious for the financial accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman—[a laugh]—and, therefore, I beg to observe that it is not £2,000,000.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I said it would be so in this next year.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Ah, but it will not. [Laughter.] The estimates formed by the Local Government Board of the effect in the whole year of the Agricultural Rating Act amounted to £1,560,000, and the equivalent grants to Scotland and Ireland make a total of £1,950,000. [Opposition laughter.] I think I may put the grant to Ireland out of the question, because Parliament has not yet applied it to the landed interest or to anybody else, and I do not think that Scotch Members would quite support the view that the Scotch equivalent grant has gone entirely, at any rate, to the landed interest; I take it, therefore, that the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman really refers to the agricultural Rating Act. The estimated effect of that Act was a grant of £1,560,000 to the Local Taxation Account. That has actually turned out to be only £1,331,000, and, of course, the corresponding grants are also diminished, so that the total effect is that £1,664,000 will in the current year be transferred from the Death Duties on personalty to the Local Taxation Account, instead of £1,950,000, as was originally estimated. We have, therefore, saved to the Exchequer in the year just closed half that amount, or £143,000, being half the difference between the estimate and the actual sum payable for a whole year. The second reason why the Death Duties have produced more to the Exchequer than I anticipated is that the principal remission which I carried last year—that relating to settled objects of art and scientific and other collections—has not come into effect during the year just concluded. There are two cases now before the Treasury, but, of course, any loss of revenue by them will be felt in the current year. The third reason is that my advisers were wrong in their anticipations as to the total amount of estates over £250,000 in value which were likely to come under the Death Duties in the year. The total amount in value of such estates in 1895-96 was £29,969,000. That was considered by those who were best able to judge an exceptionally high amount, but to the surprise of all of us it has been exceeded in the past year. The total value of such large estates in the year just closed has been £31,354,000—["hear, hear!"]—with the result that £84,000 more duty has been paid upon such estates during the year just closed than was paid in 1895-96. I am bound to say that that is a result for which I am not very sorry—["hear, hear!"]—but, after making due allowance for all these causes, I have to admit that I underestimated the receipts from the Death Duties last year. I think, however, we must be cautious before we move too rapidly in the other direction, and I will give the Committee some reasons for that view. The total amount of what is called free personalty that used on the average to come annually under the probate duties before 1894-95 was, roughly speaking, about £160,000,000. That was increased to £163,500,000 in the year 1895-96; but there has been a remarkable falling-off during the past year—a falling-off of more than £10,000,000. Taking that fact with the stories one hears, and in which I think there is some truth, as to the tendency of rich men to make over their property to their heirs in order to avoid the death duties—["hear, hear!"]—and bearing in mind that nothing is so easily made over as free personalty, I think it is possible that this falling-off of more than £10,000,000 may be but the precursor of a greater falling-off in future years. ["Hear, hear!"] So far as the past year is concerned, it has been practically made up by the increased amount of realty coming under the Death Duties. That has risen from £29,971,000, in 1895-96, to £39,606,000 in the year just closed. But the reason for that increase, of course, is this. It is well known that realty has come into the net of the Finance Act of 1894 much more slowly than personalty, and my advisers assure me that, though they think there may be an increase in the amount of realty coming under the Death Duties in future years, yet the increase of the past year will not be anything like maintained. Then, further, I have to remind the Committee that the succession duty and the legacy duty are yearly diminishing. The legacy duty last year yielded net receipts of £2,550,000, a falling-off of £181,000 as compared with the previous year, due to the exemption of small estates by the Act of 1894, and also, I think, to the fact that people are beginning to substitute gifts for legacies, a very much better thing both for the giver and the receiver, but a loss to the revenue. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] The net receipts from Succession Duty were £824,000, a falling-off of no less than £227,000, as compared with the previous year, which I expect will continue, at any rate, to some extent. Perhaps it may be of interest to the Committee if I tell them in what shares these duties have been paid respectively by realty and personalty. The total Death Duties that were paid by personalty were £11,433,000. The total Death Duties paid by realty were £2,530,000. Out of the duced £10,548,000, and of this realty paid £1,871,000 on a total value of £1,871,000 on a total value of £39,606,000, whilst personalty paid £8,677,000 on a total value of £179,803,000. Of the payments by realty to estate duty £1,708,300 were payments in full, and £162,700 were instalment, showing the fact, which I remarked upon last year, that the preference for paying in full over payment by instalments still continues. ["Hear, hear!"] I have analysed the proportion of the different kinds of realty which came under the Death Duties during the nine months previous to December 31 last. They amounted altogether to about £34,000,000. Of these £16,327,000 represented house property; £10,708,000 represented agricultural land, which was valued at an average of 16½ years' purchase of the gross value, and 20¾ years' purchase of the net value; £2,700,000 represented ground rents, and £4,181,000 represented miscellaneous property. It is estimated that the total Death Duties paid in the year by agricultural land amounted to about £843,000.

GENERAL STAMPS.

I now have only to deal with the item of stamps. Stamps produced £7,350,000, almost exactly the same as in the previous year, and £650,000 more than my estimate. I had allowed for a very large falling-off in stamps on transactions on the Stock Exchange. That falling-off took place. The receipts from that source fell from £1,533,000 to £974,000; but I had not anticipated the great increase that has occurred from stamps on deeds. There has been an increase under that head of £512,000, and an increase in the companies' capital duty of £100,000, making up for the falling-off I have noticed. There is nothing more fluctuating in the whole revenue than the receipts from stamps. I will give the Committee two instances. The receipts from Stock Exchange stamps in 1893-94 were £471,000, and in 1895-96 £1,533,000; the receipts from stamps on deeds in 1893-94 were £1,812,000; last year they were £2,984,000. I hope that the great increase in these latter stamps may be treated as a sign of improvement in the market for real property, but it would be premature to look upon it as a permanent change.

EXPENDITURE FOR THE PAST YEAR.

The estimated expenditure of the past year was £100,046,000; supplementary Estimates, £2,279,000—making a total of £102,325,000; but there were savings amounting to £848,000, so that the total Exchequer issues were £101,477,000, or £1,431,000 more than I estimated. Of this increase, £799,000 was advanced to the Egyptian Government on account of the Dongola expedition, which, as the Committee knows, will bear interest;

£145,000 was due to the expenses of the Indian garrison at Suakin, and the balance of £487,000 was due to increase in the Army, Navy, and Education Votes. I do not want to preach a sermon on economy; I attempted that to a small extent last year; but I am afraid I must say that of all the spending Departments at the present moment, I fear the House of Commons is the worst—[cheers and laughter]—and until the want of economy or the want of trying to save leads us to increased taxation, I fear we shall see no change. The increase in our expenditure since 1892-93 has been over 12 per cent.; the increase in our revenues since that time, apart from fresh taxation, has only been nine per cent. ["Hear, hear!"] In five years our Navy expenses have gone up 40 per cent.—[cheers]—the expenses of Education have gone up 43 per cent. [Cheers.] Both these kinds of expenditure are very popular and, in my belief, very necessary—[cheers]—but I must own to some feeling of doubt whether, quite apart from all the differences that we discuss so much here as to denominational and undenominational questions, our system of elementary education is such as to give the nation the best value for its money. [Cheers.] After deducting the Exchequer issues from the revenue there was a surplus in the last year of £2,473,000. As the Committee are aware, that has been devoted to the purposes of the Military Works Act of this Session, preventing an increase of new debt instead of reducing the old debt. The result will be, as the Naval Works Act of last year has also done, to augment the balances in the Exchequer. The balances in the Exchequer on April 1, 1896, amounted to a sum considerably above the average—namely, £8,975,000. On the corresponding date this year they amounted to £9,867,000. This increase was due, of course, to the fact that the Admiralty did not spend as much of the surplus of 1895-96 during the year as was anticipated. That surplus was £4,210,000; of this only £1,765,000 has been appropriated, leaving £2,445,000 still available, and, of course, the temporary augmentation of the Exchequer balances has enabled us to dispense temporarily with borrowing for other capital accounts. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean has more than once asked for a statement of naval and military expenditure which would include expenditure on capital account with the expenditure from revenue. I have not been able to frame any trustworthy estimates of the expenditure on capital account by the Admiralty or the War Office for the coming year, because so much of this work, at any rate of the naval works, is of a character that no one can accurately foresee. Take last year. A year ago the Admiralty took powers to expend 2¾ millions under the Naval Works Act, and, as a matter of fact, only £898,000 has been issued. It is clear that the estimate was entirely wrong. Work in the construction of docks, or harbours, or breakwaters, or under water depends so much on weather and seasons and other things which cannot be anticipated, that it is impossible to frame a trustworthy estimate. But I can give the right hon. Gentleman some account of the past two years. In 1895-96 the War Office expended on capital account under the Military Forces Localisation Act, £6,000, under the Imperial Defence Act £65,000, under the Barracks Act £549,000, making a total of £620,000. That, added to the expenditure from revenue in the same year, amounted to an expenditure of £19,091,000. Last year there was expended under the Barracks Act £420,000, under the Military Works Act £80,000, and that, added to the expenditure from revenue, amounted to £18,770,000. The naval expenditure under the Naval Works Act in 1895-96 amounted to £721,000, making a total of £20,358,000 for that year. Last year there was issued under the same Act £898,000, making a total of £23,068,000. Even in this account I am afraid the accounts for the year just ended are not yet accurately closed.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Now I come to the National Debt. On the 1st of April last year the total gross liabilities of the nation were £652,540,000. The funded debt was £589,147,000. The estimated capital value of the terminable annuities was £49,351,000. The unfunded debt was £9,976,600, and loans for capital expenditure on barracks and other purposes not included in the fixed debt charge amounted to £4,066,000. On the 31st March last our total gross liabilities amounted to £644,956,000. We have reduced the funded debt by £1,448,000. ["Hear, hear!"] The terminable annuities have been reduced by £4,363,000, the unfunded debt by £1,843,000, and the loans outside the fixed debt charge show a slight net increase, owing to expenditure on the purchase of the telephones and the Uganda Railway, of £70,000. The total net reduction of the debt for the year is £7,584,000. [Cheers.] But, besides being reduced, the unfunded debt has been greatly simplified. It now consists solely of Treasury Bills. The remnant of Exchequer Bonds borrowed by the First Lord of the Admiralty to pay off the holders of Consols who refused to convert has been paid off during the past year. Exchequer Bills have ceased. ["Hear, hear!"] That security, which was invented 200 years ago by one of the greatest of my predecessors, Mr. Charles Montagu, in order to effect a great recoinage for the benefit of the country, has often stood the Treasury in good stead, and never more so than during the great war early in this century. But those Bills, issued as they were latterly for terms of five years, the interest on them being fixed half-yearly by the Treasury, have become inconvenient. Certainly it was an invidious task to fix the interest on Exchequer Bills. You might fix it too high, and if you did there was a loss to the Exchequer; if you fixed it too low the holders of the Bills had a right to present them at certain periods in payment of duty. And in these days Treasury Bills issued for periods of not more than 12 months at a rate fixed by the competition of the market are far more convenient and a better form of security. ["Hear, hear!"] I may state that during the past year the Commissioners of the National Debt, in order to reduce pressure on the Consols market, have invested to the extent of more than one and a-half millions in Treasury Bills.

COINAGE.

I have to report further progress in the restoration of the gold coinage. On January 1, 1896, light gold coins of the value of £29,100,000 had been exchanged. During the year 1896 £2,400,000 more were withdrawn at a cost of £33,000. On January 1, 1897, the amount—it is estimated—of light gold in circulation was only 8 per cent. of the total coinage, and of that light gold one-fifth of the light sovereigns and 30 per cent. of the light half-sovereigns were so nearly legal in weight that neither the eye nor any balance in ordinary use could possibly detect that they were wrong. So far as the metropolis and the principal centres of industry are concerned, it may be said that the restoration of our gold coinage has been completed, though, of course, we still have to provide for perpetual wear and tear. But a good deal still remains to be done in the country districts, and especially in the more remote parts of the United Kingdom. I have been in communication during the past year with the authorities of the Bank of England and the Country Bankers' Association, and I have arranged that greater facilities should be given for the reception by the branches of the Bank of England of small parcels of light gold and the payment of the cost of conveyance from the provinces for a limited period, and I have every reason to anticipate that by the end of six months from this time a good deal will have been done towards completing the restoration of the coinage. The Bank of England may then exercise more stringently than now the discretion granted to it by the Act of 1891. £32,000 provided by that Act for the restoration of coinage is still unexpended, besides the amount authorised to be similarly applied by the Act of 1893. The operations of the Mint with regard to the coinage have been very extensive during the past year. I think as much as six millions sterling in value of different coins has been struck at the Mint in the year which has just closed, as against five millions in the year preceding, and the great increase has been in silver and copper, especially in copper. Twenty-five million pieces of silver coin, and thirty-two million pieces of copper coin have been struck; 245 tons of copper have been used in that coinage, and the copper coinage of the year is more than three times as much in value as that of the preceding year. I inquired the reason. Of course, it is partly due, I hope, to the increased prosperity in trade and generally amongst the working classes. But it was curious to learn that in the view of the authorities of the Mint, not a little of the increased demand for copper was due to the increased number of articles, whether useful or otherwise the Committee may decide, which may be obtained by the simple process of putting a penny in the slot. [Laughter.]

SIXTY YEARS' RETROSPECT.

Sir, I have now completed the usual and necessary comparison of the past year with that immediately preceding it, but I hope I shall not be detaining the Committee at too great length if on this occasion I make a more distant comparison. ["Hear, hear!"] In a few weeks the nation will be celebrating a great anniversary of a great reign. [Loud cheers.] It will be interesting to all of us to look back on the extraordinary change which has come over the condition of the country during the past sixty years, but I doubt if in anything the extent of that change can be better realised than by a comparison of the altered requirements of the community as reflected in the revenue raised and the expenditure provided for by the State in the year 1836-37, before Her Majesty's accession, and the year just closed. The Committee will be pleased to remember that in the figures I shall give adjustments have been made in order to provide for the alterations—the very useful alterations—in the national account-keeping that have come into use during that period. Now, the total revenue of the nation in the year 1836 was £52,500,000. In the year just closed it was £112,000,000. In the first period, 71·8 per cent., nearly three-quarters, of the revenue was raised by taxes on commodities. ["Hear, hear!"] In the last period 44·3 per cent. was so raised. In the early period almost everything was taxed. ["Hear, hear!"] I wish my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield had lived in those days—[laughter and cheers]—because I do not think he would now ask us to imitate that period. ["Hear, hear!"] There were 1,135 separate rates of Customs Duties. There were duties on exports, there were bounties on various articles, and yet the whole net produce of the Customs in the year 1836 was only three-quarters of a million more than we raise now almost entirely from duties on three articles—alcohol, tobacco, and tea. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not want to dwell on the effect of that system upon the industry of the country. I do not want to discuss how much the price of articles grown in this country on which there was no Excise duty may have been raised by duties, often prohibitive, on similar articles imported from abroad, but I should just like to give the Committee a single small, concrete instance of the effect of the Customs Duties at that time upon a few articles of ordinary consumption in a poor labourer's household. ["Hear, hear!"] I quote from a Report addressed in the year 1841 by Mr. Carleton Tufnell to the Poor Law Commissioners. He frames a household budget of a labourer with four children, earning on the average 13s. 2d. a week. He puts down the number of articles that would be consumed in that household, and the annual quantities of each. I have taken only five of those articles—sugar, tea, tobacco, soap, and pepper. Taking the quantities suggested by Mr. Tufnell, and taking the taxation of that day, I find that a labourer would have paid £2 3s. 5d. a year—three and a-half weeks' wages—in taxation on those articles alone. ["Hear, hear!"] Now he would pay on the same articles 12s. 5½d. How has this change been effected? Of course it has been effected by an increased amount of taxation on property; 39·7 per cent. of our revenue now is raised by direct taxation; 23·2 of it was so raised in 1836. But what has been the result of the change on the industry of the country? In 1836 our total foreign trade amounted to a value of £125,000,000; last year it amounted to about £738,000,000. [Cheers.] My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield is not very fond of foreign imports. It may comfort him—I do not know whether it will or not—to know that in 1836 our foreign imports were only £67,000,000 in value. I am glad to know that they have now increased to nearly £442,000,000. [Cheers.] But what were our exports of home produce? It is desired to encourage home produce. Has that home produce been encouraged? The exports of home produce were £42,000,000 in 1836; they were £240,000,000 last year. [Cheers.] And, Sir, out of this enormous extension of industry has come great and permanent benefit to the working classes of the country, and I know of no way in which that can be better testified than by the increase of deposits in the savings banks. In 1836 those deposits amounted to £18,750,000, placed there by 598,000 persons. Last year they amounted to £155,000,000, placed there by no less than 8,396,000 persons. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1836, out of every 43 men, women, and children, only one was a depositor in the savings banks; now there is one out of every five. [Cheers.] There is one other point in which a comparison of the revenue of the two periods is instructive, and that is the great advance in the receipts from non-tax sources in the present day. [At this point Sir H. Vincent entered the House and walked to his seat amidst general cheers and laughter.] In 1836 only £2,500,000—5 per cent. of the total revenue—was so derived. In 1896-97 nearly £18,000,000, 16 per cent. of the total revenue—came from non-tax sources. Of course, this has come mainly from the great expansion of our postal service. I do not think we can overestimate the extraordinary advantage to the country from the expansion of that service. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1836 it cost 4d. to send a letter 15 miles in the United Kingdom, it cost 1s. to send a letter 300 miles, it cost 10d. to send a letter to France, it cost 1s. 8d. to send a letter to Germany, and it cost 3s. 6d. to send a letter to South America. No wonder it was said that—

> "Letters were sent when franks could be procured,
> And when they could not, silence was endured."

[Laughter.] For every letter sent in those days we now send 22, and for every newspaper or packet sent in those days we send 28. There was no telegraph in those days, but we send more telegrams in a year now than post-paid letters were sent at the time of the accession of the Queen; and with that great accommodation to the public there has been an increase in the profit to the Exchequer. In 1836 the Post Office produced a net profit of £1,481,000; last year it produced £3,936,000. ["Hear, hear!"] I now turn to the expenditure. That in 1836 was £50,500,000; last year it was £109,750,000. Under three great heads there has been an enormous increase in our expenditure. The expenditure on the Army, Navy, and civil administration has risen from £16,464,000 in 1836 to £70,377,000 now. We expend nearly four-and-a-quarter times as much. Our Army cost us in 1836 £8,000,000, now £18,250,000. Our Navy cost in 1836 £4,000,000; it now costs £22,000,000. [Cheers.] Sir, that increased expense is necessary from the enormous expansion of our Empire, from the great expansion of our commerce, from the greatly incrased cost of the armaments of modern times, but most of all from the great increase in the naval and military strength of other nations and the fact that it is concentrated in fewer hands. But we get, I think, a good return for our money. We have double the number of regular soldiers at home now that we had then. Our soldiers are better paid, better armed, and better housed. We have 70,000 more Militia, we have 80,000 Army Reserve, and 236,000 Volunteers. We have three-and-a-half times as many men and boys in the Navy. We have double the number of Marines, nearly double the number of ships, three times the tonnage, and I do not know how great an increase in offensive and defensive power. Sir, there has been an increase in the cost of civil administration from £4,500,000 to nearly £30,000,000. Our education estimates are now £9,500,000; then that expenditure by the State was unknown. Our grants to local taxation in aid of the taxpayers are £11,500,000; then they were but a few hundred thousand a year; and we spend £4,500,000 more to secure a more efficient administration of the law, in the better protection of the people and of life and property, in the encouragement of science and art, and in a large number of multifarious wants due to our modern civilisation, which were never dreamed of by the people when Her Majesty acceded to the throne. ["Hear, hear!"]

DECREASES OF EXPENDITURE.

But if our increases of expenditure have been remarkable, even more remarkable have been the decreases of expenditure. First of all, there are the services of the Debt. Our predecessors in 1836 had to pay £29,575,000, or 58·5 per cent, of their total expenditure for the annual charge of the Debt. We pay £25,000,000 or 22 per cent of the total expenditure. Interest and management of the Debt cost them £27,686,000. They cost us £17,779,000—["hear, hear!"]—nearly ten millions less than it cost them. They were only able to devote to paying it off £1,889,000. We devote £7,221,000 to the same purpose. With them the annual interest of the Debt was an annual tax of 21s. 8d. per head of the population; with us it is only 9s. per head. On them the total burden of the Debt was £33 9s. 3d. per head of the population; on us it is less than half—£16 6s. 6½d. It is not surprising that Consols have risen in value so much that, while in 1836 a man could obtain an income from Consols of £3 by investing £89 10s., he has now to spend £121 for the same result. ["Hear, hear!"] The second reduction in expenditure has been in the cost of collecting the revenue. It costs us less to collect £94,250,000 of taxes than it cost our predecessors to collect £50,000,000. [Cheers.] It cost them £5 14s. 2d. per £100; and it costs us only £2 17s. 8d. per £100. And with all that diminution of the cost, smuggling, which was then a real profession, has become practically extinct. But the last head of all, although small, is perhaps the most interesting at the present time. Our monarchy was never so valuable to the country as it is at the present moment. [Loud cheers.] The personal influence of the Sovereign was never so great in European Courts. [Renewed cheers.] The Crown was never so necessary as now, when it unites an enormously extended Empire; and since 1836 the population and wealth of the United Kingdom itself have enormously increased. We hear sometimes grumblings at the cost of the monarchy, though we are not likely to hear them in the present year. [Cheers.] But no doubt they will be repeated some day. What are the facts as to the comparative cost of the monarchy in 1836 and now? When Her Majesty came to the Throne Parliament voted £385,000 a year to her Civil List, exclusive of Civil List pensions; and Parliament took in return Crown estates which then produced a net income of £203,000. The result was that the taxpayers of that day bore a charge on that account of £182,000. The same Crown estates now produce a net income of £412,000, so that the taxpayers at the present moment make a net profit by that transaction of £27,000 a year. [Cheers.] But that is not all. Besides the Civil List we grant allowances to members of the Royal Family and we vote sums for the maintenance of the Royal palaces. These two items amounted in the year 1836, the first to £312,000 a year and the second to £40,000 a year. Last year they amounted, the first to £173,000 a year and the second to £39,000 a year. So that in 1836 the total cost of the monarchy to the taxpayers was £534,000 a year, and last year it was £185,000 a year. [Cheers.] We pride ourselves, and I think justly, on possessing the best monarchy in the world. [Cheers.] But I am sure we may add that we also have the cheapest. [Laughter.] I could go on through many another matter—through the increase of our mercantile marine, the extension of our railway system, the enormous increase of personal wealth, the increased investments of all classes in all forms of industrial enterprise, the increased consumption per head of the population, both of the necessaries and the luxuries of life. Every comparison would bear testimony to the wonderful improvement in the material well-being of the people of the United Kingdom which has occurred since 1836. Our people, I think I may say, are better governed, are better protected, are better educated than they were. Wages have risen, houses are better and healthier, food and clothing are cheaper, and, perhaps as important as anything, crime has enormously diminished. ["Hear, hear!"] I feel that all classes and all persons may not equally have benefited, that much may remain yet to be done. But this, I think, may be said with fairness. At no previous period of the country's history in a similar number of years has so much real improvement and progress been made, and I am quite sure that no similar period can show a nobler reign. [Cheers.]

ESTIMATED EXPENDITURE, 1897-8.

I hope I have not trespassed too long—[loud cheers]—on the attention of the Committee in dealing with the past. I now turn to the future. According to the original Estimates the total expenditure of the coming year may be put at £109,904,000. But of that £8,979,000 is the estimated amount which will go to the local taxation fund. Deducting this I have to provide for the original Estimates of £100,925,000, an excess over the original Estimates of last year of £878,000. There has been a slight decrease of £10,000 on the Consolidated Fund Services. Elsewhere there have been increases, the most important being an increase of £373,000 on the Civil Service Estimates, due principally to colonial and educational requirements, and an increase of £388,000 on the postal service, due to augmented business. But since the original Estimates were presented further Estimates have been presented of £140,000, nearly all for an increase of wages to those employed in the postal services. Then Parliament has passed the Voluntary Schools Act, which will add £616,000 to the educational Estimates of the year, and this House has given a Second Reading to the Necessitous Board Schools Bill, which will involve an additional charge of £110,000. The total increase on the original Estimates is, therefore, £866,000, making a total expenditure of £101,791,000.

ESTIMATED REVENUE, 1897-8.

Against that I anticipate the following revenue: From Customs, £21,500,000, an increase of £246,000 on last year. From Excise, £27,750,000, an increase of £290,000 on last year. Death duties produced last year £10,830,000. They must necessarily produce £832,000 less this year, because that sum will go to the local taxation fund. I have already explained to the Committee some of the reasons why we ought not to be too sanguine in our estimate. So we cannot put the yield of the death duties this year at more than £9,700,000. Stamps I put at £7,000,000, less than last year by £350,000; land and house tax at £2,400,000, a small falling-off of £30,000; income tax at £16,900,000, an increase of £250,000; Post Office at £12,210,000, an increase of £350,000; telegraphs at £2,960,000, an increase of £50,000; Crown lands at £415,000; Suez Canal shares, etc., at £750,000, an increase of £56,000, due to certain loans having been transferred to this head from miscellaneous revenue, and also to the interest on the advance lately made to Egypt; and miscellaneous revenue at £1,775,000, a decrease of £322,000. That gives a total revenue of £103,360,000, against a total expenditure of £101,791,000.

SURPLUS:—NAVAL EXPENDITURE.

That appears to show that I have a sum of £1,569,000 to dispose of. But I am afraid I have a disappointment in store for those who may anticipate that this can be applied to the reduction of taxation. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] The Committee will remember that the original Army and Navy Estimates for the present year were practically identical with those of the preceding year. They were properly so framed at the time. But circumstances have changed. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, when introducing the Navy Estimates, said that, if any abnormal programmes were actually put into execution which would seem to disturb the general amount of naval power belonging to different countries, Her Majesty's Government would think it their duty to reconsider their position as to the condition of the naval defences of the country. [Cheers.] The additional expenditure proposed elsewhere since my right hon. Friend made this statement has been very carefully considered, and Her Majesty's Government have decided, in conformity with the policy announced by my right hon. Friend, that an addition of half a million should be made to the Navy Estimates. [Cheers.] A Supplementary Vote for this amount will be proposed, and the mode in which the sum will be appropriated will be explained by the First Lord of the Admiralty on the Shipbuilding Vote. But it must be clearly understood that a special addition like this to the expenditure on new construction in one year does not necessarily fix the normal expenditure for future years. Therefore I have to provide on that score for £500,000.

SOUTH AFRICAN GARRISON.

Then Her Majesty's Government have had to consider very carefully the responsibility of their position as the paramount Power in South Africa—[loud cheers]—and they have deemed it necessary to make a material increase in the Imperial garrison in that part of the world. [Cheers.] My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies will take an early opportunity of explaining the reasons for that decision—["hear, hear!"]—but I may shortly say that it has been taken in no aggressive spirit—["hear, hear!"]—that we intend to fulfil to the utmost all our own obligations; but we expect others to do the same. [Cheers.] I have to reserve £200,000 on account of that, which will leave me £869,000 to deal with.

POST OFFICE REFORMS.

It is clear to the Committee that this sum is quite insufficient to make any reduction in what may be called general taxation. ["Hear, hear!"] To devote it—or such portion of it as can be spared from the normal small margin such as the Chancellor of the Exchequer is always entitled to—to the reduction of the income tax would be impossible, and to devote it to the reduction of the duty on any article of great popular consumption would only lead to the advantage of the dealers in that particular commodity. I do not think it ought to be devoted to anything but the general advantage of the public at large. ["Hear, hear!"] I have to remind the Committee that our revenue is derived, not only from taxes, but from payments by the public for services rendered to them, and if these payments are in any case higher than they ought to be the result is tantamount to excessive taxation. I call the attention of the Committee to the net receipts from Post Office revenue. ["Hear!"] The net estimated profit from the postal service in the current year, after allowing £139,000 for the increase in the payments to postal servants, amounts to £3,665,000. My noble Friend the Postmaster General desires to make certain postal reforms with a view to the development of the rural districts—[cheers]—by a more generous treatment in postal matters, and to simplify regulations and benefit trade by removing unnecessary restrictions, and to some extent benefiting the writers of foreign and colonial as well as inland letters. He has placed before me proposals which I will shortly state to the Committee, as to which I wish to say that the credit is entirely due to him; that I have but accepted his recommendations and ask Parliament to provide the funds to meet them. In the first place, he proposes an important reform with regard to the delivery of letters in the United Kingdom. I dare say the Committee will hardly believe that at the present moment there are 16 millions of letters sent annually by the post in the United Kingdom which are not delivered by the Post Office to the persons to whom they are addressed, but are left at the Post Office or some other house of call until they are called for. ["Hear, hear!"] Even if we allow, as we may allow, for circulars and certain other communications which no one is very anxious to receive—[laughter]—yet the Post Office calculates that there are ten millions of real letters in that position every year—a number equal, I believe, to three-quarters of our total foreign correspondence. It does not require much thought to see what a hardship that must be upon persons living in rural districts, and especially upon the poor. [Cheers.] I do not think myself it ought to have lasted so long. ["Hear, hear!"] It has not lasted so long in France and Belgium. In both those countries they have, I think, a regular delivery to every house. Our Post Office intend to bring about the same. It will take a considerable time, for they will have first to commence, no doubt, with a delivery in every little hamlet, but as fast as possible they will take steps to secure that there shall be a delivery—not necessarily every day, but still a regular delivery—at every house in the United Kingdom. [Cheers.] That will lead also to a multiplication of rural post offices and of pillar letter-boxes in order to provide for the same kind of services. Further, with regard to the delivery of telegrams—[cheers]—it is proposed that telegrams shall be delivered free within three miles—["hear, hear!"]—and that for distances beyond that limit the charge shall be reduced to 3d. a mile from the office door. ["Hear, hear!"] It is proposed in the metropolis that there shall be free delivery of telegrams on every day of the week, and at all hours of the day and night. ["Hear, hear!" cries of "Oh!" and laughter.] I am afraid that hon. Members have not quite caught my meaning. [Laughter.] I have no desire to be woke up by a telegram at night. [Laughter.] But the present state of things is this—that on Sundays and at certain hours of the night some telegraph offices are temporarily closed, so that telegrams addressed to persons living at a considerable distance from the offices which are left open have to be paid for according to the distance from the office which is open, and not from the office which is closed. That is a public hardship in the metropolis, and therefore in future the delivery of telegrams will be free at all hours. ["Hear, hear!"] Complaint has been made on all sides as to the cost of the guarantee required for telegraph offices in rural disstricts. ["Hear, hear!"] The Postmaster General feels it impossible entirely to abolish that system, because he considers that it would result in unreasonable demands—perhaps, say, from wealthy persons with a shooting-box in the Highlands for a telegraph office for their own service. But my noble Friend proposes that the Post Office shall bear half the cost of the liability of any such guarantee, so that the locality, or the persons concerned, will only be liable to half the charge for which they are now liable; and, further, when the term of the guarantee has expired, my noble Friend proposes that the telegraph office to which the guarantee relates shall be continued, if it is of any service whatever to the public at large, without further guarantee. ["Hear, hear!"] Then a reduction is proposed in the parcel postage rate—["hear, hear!"]—for every subsequent pound beyond the first. The present charge is 1½d., amounting to a maximum of 1s. 6d. In future it is proposed that the charge shall be as now, 3d. for the first pound, and then 1d. per pound, up to a maximum of 1s. These matters may seem to the Committee small things in themselves. [Cries of "No!"] But after all, much of the comfort and discomfort of life, especially in the rural districts, is made up of small things—["hear, hear!"]—and when these changes are carried into effect many an inhabitant in the rural districts will feel that his lot is somewhat more equalised than it was with that of the more fortunate dwellers in the towns. The next change is one of a larger character, and perhaps more important to tradesmen than those I have mentioned. At the present moment samples and books travel by post at cheaper rates than ordinary letters. The postage of samples and books is, however, surrounded by the Post Office with the most minute restrictions, which are very troublesome to the public and to the Post Office officials themselves. The result of those restrictions is often absurd. Take, for instance, the sample post. A man may send a pair of gloves as a sample, but if the person to whom the gloves are sent buys them a penalty is incurred. A gardener may send cut flowers as a sample, but if they are bought a penalty is incurred. And yet flowers may be sent cheaply by parcel post to the purchaser in England from the south of France. With regard to the book post, I dare say the Committee think they know what a book is. [Laughter.] I thought I did until I studied the two and a-half pages of closely-printed matter in the Postal Guide, which explains what a book is in the eyes of the Post Office. [Laughter.] The Postmaster General proposes that in the future the sample post shall be entirely abolished; that the book post shall be abolished above 2oz., under which books will still go for a halfpenny, and that all articles, whether letters, samples, or books, under a maximum of 4oz., shall be sent for one penny —[cheers]—with a further charge of one halfpenny for every 2oz. exceeding that amount. I believe that will be felt by the public as a very great advantage, as saving of infinite trouble, and also it will be a very great saving of trouble to the officials of the Post Office. I now come to the last point, which relates to foreign and colonial letters. I am afraid I have nothing to say which will satisfy my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury. [Laughter.] It must be remembered that the paying postal service is the home postal service; and even now foreign letters are carried at a loss. But it is proposed that in future there shall be a change made in the postage of foreign and colonial letters, which now amounts to 2½d. per half oz. The amount fixed for the postage under the rules of the Postal Union is 25 centimes, and 2½d. was adopted by our postal authorities as the nearest expression in English coinage to 25 centimes, the result being that we have at present the dearest foreign postage of any important nation in the world. The rate cannot be altered without the assent of the Postal Union, which meets, I believe, next month at Washington, and at that meeting our representatives will propose that the rate of 2½d. shall be reduced to 2d., which will, at any rate, place us on an equality with other nations. [" Hear, hear ! "] It will take some time to bring all those changes into operation, especially the last change, which cannot be brought into operation until January 1 next at the earliest. I calculate that the total cost of them, assuming that they will be brought into operation as soon as possible, will be £366,000 for the current year.

FINAL BALANCE SHEET.

Now, Sir, I have to state to the Committee my final balance-sheet. I have provided for a tax revenue of £85,250,000, and a revenue from non-tax sources, after making the necessary deductions in my previous Post Office Estimates, of £17,794,000—a total of £103,044,000. The expenditure will be £26,650,000 for the Consolidated Fund Services, £18,341,000 for the Army Services, £22,338,000 for the Naval Services, £20,895,000 for the Civil Services, £2,762,000 for Customs and Inland Revenue, £11,555,000 for Post Office Services, a total of £102,541,000, leaving me a margin of £503,000. Out of that margin I expect to have to provide for certain expenditure in connection with the improvement of education in Scotland, and also for technical education in Ireland, according to promises already made in this House ; and, further, for an expenditure which I mention because I am sure the House will desire to be generous with regard to it—that is, for the entertainment of our foreign and colonial guests on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee. [Cheers.] I leave myself, I think, not too large a margin for the current year. I have no doubt that I shall be told, as indeed I have been told, already, by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouthshire, that in each of two successive years I have had a very large surplus and have not reduced taxation. [Opposition cheers.] Well, Sir, I demur to that statement. I do not dwell on the small reduction of the land tax, or of the estate duties which Parliament sanctioned last year ; I believe they were just, and I believe they have done good, but they were small in amount. Nor do I dwell upon the postal reforms which I have just announced, although I believe they will be of great benefit to the people—[cheers]—and that they will give relief which is in reality a reduction of taxation. But, Sir, I join issue with the right hon. Gentleman on the main item of his argument. He says that money has been squandered in the Agricultural Rating Act—[Opposition cheers]—and the corresponding Acts for Scotland and Ireland which were passed last year ; in the Voluntary Schools Act, which was passed this year ; and in the Bill now passing through the House for the benefit of necessitous schools. I say that each and every one of those Measures are direct or indirect reductions of taxation. [Ministerial cheers.] What is it that is becoming the most oppressive burden now upon the people ? It is not Imperial taxation ; it is local taxation. [" Hear, hear ! "] In the Measures which I have named we have attempted to relieve local taxation through Imperial revenues. I believe that has been a wiser policy than if we had attempted to devote the same amount which has been absorbed by those Measures to reducing any Imperial tax. [Ministerial cheers, and Opposition cries of " No ! "] There are taxpayers who complain. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton made an eloquent appeal last year on behalf of the payers of income tax. There are persons in the country to whom the income tax is odious, although I believe they are a decreasing number. I had a correspondent who wrote from Scotland and told me that in his opinion the income tax was a device of the evil one to lead us into temptation, that it was opposed alike to Christianity and morality—[laughter]—and that it could not be defended by any believer in a future state. [Renewed laughter.] I am happy to say that he went on to inform me that he had resisted the temptation to cheat the revenue. Another correspondent believed that a tax of 10s. per horse on pleasure horses would enable me to make a sensible reduction in the income tax. There are other persons with similar delusions. I had one correspondent who went even beyond the right hon. Gentleman opposite in his admiration of death duties, for to his mind all tombstones and memorial tablets were fulsome and useless luxuries, which were as impious as they vere foolish. I had another correspondent who thought a large revenue could be raised by making bachelors over 25 years of age liable to income tax f their incomes were over £80 a year, because they only spent their money in njuring themselves. [Loud laughter.] And, finally, almost everybody who does not ride a bicycle thinks that an enormous reduction might be made in the taxation which particularly presses upon himself if a small tax were placed on those who do ride bicycles. Sir, I have resisted all these temptations for altering our system of taxation. I hope that some day it may be possible to make a sensible reduction in the income tax—[" hear, hear!"]—but I do not think that the reduction ought to be made by transferring the burden to other shoulders. I hope in quieter times than these it may be possible to make it by a real reduction in our expenditure. [Cheers.] I do not think it wise to make small changes in our system of taxation which, even if defensible in themselves, yet by their very novelty would harass and disturb the complex and delicate fabric of our trade. Great changes in our fiscal system will sometimes be necessary. [Sir HOWARD VINCENT: "Hear, hear!" and laughter.] If after full inquiry it is found that our present fiscal system does real injustice to Scotland and to Ireland, a great change will be necessary then. But, Sir, at the present moment, with increasing comfort among the people, with wealth more widely diffused, with Imperial taxation more easily borne than at any previous period of our history, I do not think it is a time for change. [Cheers.] So far as I can see, I may well be content if it can be said that, at any rate, I have done nothing to impede, and, I hope, a trifle to assist, the progress of the country in that direction which we all desire. [Loud cheers.]—The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution for the reimposition of the duty on tea.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.), who on rising was received with loud Oppositon cheers, said: I feel it would be presumptuous on my part to offer congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman on the ability, the clearness, and the satisfactory character of the statement he has made. The capacities of the right hon. Gentleman are too well known to this House to require any compliment of that description. One of these days he may acquire in the history of this country the addition of the adjective which formerly belonged to a Chancellor of the Exchequer who went by the name of "Prosperity Robinson." [Laughter.] I shall not repeat to the right hon. Gentleman the lecture which he addressed to me last year upon the great offence committed by a Chancellor of the Exchequer who had a surplus beyond his expectation. He told me that it was no feather in the cap of any Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the triumph of a Chancellor of the Exchequer was when the Exchequer receipts agreed with his Estimates; he said that he was profiting by my miscalculation, and that he hoped that for once and only for once the authorities of the revenue had proved fallible guides. Sir, I am very glad they have proved this year again to be fallible guides. I am very glad indeed that the right hon. Gentleman has made a miscalculation in having an excess of revenue of several millions above his Estimates, and that he will dispense with that feather in his cap which he said was the highest honour to which a Chancellor of the Exchequer could aspire. We must all rejoice in these evidences of the growing prosperity of the country, and in every department I hope the lesson will be taken to heart. Although I sometimes disagree with the right hon. Gentleman, in the application of his principles, I always concur and find myself in absolute agreement with the financial principles which he lays down. I regret very much that the hon. Member for Sheffield arrived too late to receive instruction from the Chancellor of the Exchequer —[laughter]—but I hope he will spend to-morrow in reading several times over the doctrine which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has so wisely and well laid down to-day, especially that part addressed to the hon. Member. The right hon. Gentleman took some exception to my having claimed to have supplied him to a certain extent with this bountiful revenue of which he has had the disposal, and he said that at all events the surplus for this year—though he pleaded in extenuation that his offspring was only a little one—[laughter]—was entirely due to himself and not at all to me. But then he proceeded to say that the Death Duties had produced considerably more than he expected. Well, so they did; they gave him a million more than he calculated for, and therefore I think I had some right to the claim that I had contributed to his prosperity. The fact is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is only a slow, and as yet, I am sorry to say, an imperfect convert to the success of the Death Duties. He very candidly said he was surprised last year that they had yielded so much as they had done. He has given us an interesting account of the working of the Death Duties. But there is a more apt pupil in the study of the death duties than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that is my predecessor, now the First Lord of the Admiralty, who, not in a Budget speech, but in an after-dinner oration, confessed his complete conversion to the merits of the Death Duties. I read with great satisfaction this statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He said:—

> "When I see the proceeds of some of these taxes which have been imposed, and their effect, I endeavour to gauge that effect as regards their ability to meet certain items of naval expenditure, and when the changes and chances of this mortal life bring millionaires, and more than millionaires, under the operation of these duties I cannot resist the temptation of translating the cheques poured into that till over which Sir Alfred Milner lately presided into naval defence. When a cheque for £100,000 is paid into the Revenue by more than a millionaire, I say that represents two torpedo boats, or if it is a smaller sum, that represents a most effective gunboat."

This is the gentleman who in 1894, when the Death Duties were proposed to meet a great and increased demand for naval expenditure, offered to them at every stage the most violent and most bitter opposition. He predicted every sort of financial disaster from these unsound principles and their application He opposed that tax and every other proposal to meet the exigencies of the country, and now he counts up the gains derived from this iniquitous taxation and ends in this way:—

> "More seriously I look to the smoothness with which the Inland Revenue is collected, and I think how wisely, on the whole, the taxes have been imposed and with what judgment they have been collected. Where should we be in asking for these colossal funds if they could not be provided without undue pressure on the taxpayer and if they gall on the shoulders of those who had to bear them?"

That is the testimony of the right hon. Gentleman to the effect of the Death Duties. But, instead of speaking in the exhilaration of an after-dinner oration, he ought to have made in his place in this House, in a costume which would have become him, and in which we should have been delighted to have seen him, the declaration—

> "Where should we have been if, in asking for these colossal funds, they could not be provided without undue pressure on the taxpayer, and if they gall on the shoulders of those who have to bear them?"

Was there ever greater testimony to the soundness of the principles which the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to defeat three years ago? The right hon. Gentleman has testified also to the injustice of some of the apprehensions that were entertained at that time. What was the argument specially coming from the landed interest? They said: "You are ruining the landed interest; they cannot find the money to pay these Death Duties;" and the consequence was a long period of instalments was allowed in order to make the facilities for payment greater. Now, how has it turned out? So far from the pressure being undue, and so far from the instalments being necessary, people find it more convenient to pay the Death Duties at once. Is not that testimony to the fact stated by the First Lord of the Admiralty that these funds have been provided without undue pressure on the taxpayer, and do not gall the shoulders of those who have to pay them? [Opposition cheers.] After all we have heard, and what we hear every day of the moans of the Duke of Devonshire and others as to the injury and destruction of their class, let us see what that class pays. The right hon. Gentleman says the sum contributed out of land is £800,000.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: £843,000.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, but what is given back to the landowners? You have given them back £1,300,000. [Opposition cheers and laughter.] That is the manner in which you have dealt with the landed interest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer just now said that this was all done in relief of rates. Yes, Sir, but of whose rates? Not the rates of the whole country, not the rates of all classes, not the rates of the classes who suffer most from the rates and who are the dwellers in towns. The complaint we have made is not that you have reduced the rates, but that you have reduced them in the most unfair and partial manner, and have given relief where the rates are lightest and none where they are heaviest, and that in the very year when the right hon. Gentleman, in the statement he has made, which we all recognise with satisfaction, says that the landed interest has had the advantage of improved prices and improved profits. I listened with great interest and satisfaction to the admirable review which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave of the financial condition of this country as it was at the commencement of the auspicious reign of the Queen, and what it is to-day. Yes, and there was one incident in that review the most important of all. It was the reform—yet incomplete, I hope and believe—of the monstrous injustice by which previously to that period the whole or almost the whole of the taxation of the country was placed on the poor and consumer—the direct taxation which fell on the wealthier class was only one-fourth of the taxation of the country, and three-fourths were borne by the consuming class. If there is anything we have learnt from that important investigation of the Irish Commission it is this—that indirect taxation is most unjust in its incidence because it fell on those least able to bear it, and that these reforms, associated in the main with the great names of Peel and Gladstone, which increased direct taxation and reduced indirect taxation, were the keystone of the prosperity of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke. But what was the cause of those reforms? The cause was the Reform Bill of 1832, which put power into the hands of the people. So long as power remained in the hands of those whose interest was identified with indirect taxation as against direct taxation, you had direct taxation at the lowest possible point, and indirect taxation at the highest. It is only since the people have had real control of the taxation of the country that it has been possible to establish a just system of taxation. That is the practical lesson which is to be learned from the review the right hon. Gentleman has placed before us. I must again repeat what I have said elsewhere, and the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to it, that I think it is deeply to be deplored that in two successive years of a great surplus there has been no material relief of taxation. The right hon. Gentleman claims a grant to the landed interest of a sum of £2,000,000, and which he says he estimated at £1,950,000. I will give him the benefit of the difference of £50,000. What I desire is a reduction of taxation which would be for the benefit of all classes and not of one; and what I would point out is that, but for gifts of this description, whether to the landed interest or to a particular religious denomination to whom he has made a grant under the Voluntary Schools Bill, the right hon. Gentleman must have had a surplus, according to the account he gives to-day, of £2,000,000. Owing to them, and the £1,500,000 of which he spoke as disposable surplus until he came to dispose of it in military operations, he would have had between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 for the reduction of taxation with which he might have reduced direct and indirect taxation. I will not go further into that matter now, following the example of my great predecessor, Mr. Gladstone. ["Hear, hear!"] He always held that on the first night of the Budget it was not wise to go into the details of the financial operations. But there is one thing to which I must advert, and that is what I call the fly in the pot of ointment of the right hon. Gentleman. He has announced as one of his reasons why the surplus he had at his disposal is to be melted down that a sum of several hundred thousand pounds is to be provided for the support of a war policy in South Africa. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, I know the right hon. Gentleman is not in favour of a war policy in South Africa. But the Minister responsible for the colonies has made it sufficiently apparent that this is a war policy. In every utterance of his during the last few months there is no doubt he has been endeavouring to exasperate sentiment in that country—[Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" and Opposition cheers]—and to produce what, thank God, he has failed in producing—a racial war. [Renewed Opposition cheers.]

Yes, Sir; but his policy has been defeated. It has been defeated by the good sense and good feeling of the people of Cape Colony, and the vote taken the other day was a vote of condemnation of this war policy. That vote was in support of a peace policy, and by a majority, I am happy to say, the Cape Government rejected the policy which is represented by these additional estimates. [At this point Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the House and took his seat on the Treasury Bench amidst loud Ministerial cheers.] I rejoice in that majority, and I repeat in the presence of the right hon. Gentleman that it was the triumph of the peace party in South Africa. It was the defeat of an attempt to get up this ill-feeling, utterly unjustifiable, utterly without foundation, and it was a declaration on the part of the majority of the people of Cape Colony and of the Government of the Cape that they would seek the arrangement of all differences which might exist between them and the Government of the Transvaal by peaceable and not by warlike operations. [Cheers.] Therefore, when we are asked to refuse the reduction of the taxation of the people in order that we may contribute money to promote aggressive and warlike operations in South Africa—[loud Ministerial cries of "Oh!"]—we shall oppose the most determined resistance; and I deeply regret that in this Budget, which in other respects might have been regarded as a satisfactory and prosperous Budget, we should be introduced to a declaration that the resources of this country and the means by which the taxation of this people might have been reduced should be applied to purposes which, in my opinion, are utterly unjustifiable—[Ministerial laughter and Opposition cheers]—which are rejected by the people of the Cape Colony, which are rejected by the Government of the Cape Colony—and I venture to say that the exhibition of this spirit is one of the most injurious things in connection with the Empire that has yet been proposed in the House of Commons. [Opposition cheers.] It might have been dangerous. I am happy to say it is not dangerous now; the vote in the Assembly of the Cape Colony has disposed of that. It is utterly impossible for any Party or any Minister to enforce upon the people of the Cape the spirit of hostility and aggression which they themselves are unwilling to accept. In regard to this part of the Budget I am sorry to tell the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, though I do not impute to him a desire to proceed in any spirit of this description, if he is going to make proposals of that character, inspired by that spirit, and likely to have that effect, I am afraid he must count upon great resistance on the part of those who desire peace in South Africa as they desire it in the rest of the Empire.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN), who was received with loud Ministerial cheers, said: I certainly did not expect to intervene in this Debate, and it is difficult for me to justify the South African policy of the Government on the occasion of the introduction of the Budget. But it has been made absolutely necessary for me to say a few words, at all events, in reference to the pernicious and dangerous language—[loud Ministerial cheers]—unpatriotic in the highest degree—[renewed cheering]—embarrassing to the Government, and injurious to the cause of peace—which has just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers.] Sir, I am sorry I did not hear the opening words in which he referred to this subject; but, as I understand, the right hon. Gentleman accuses the Government of being about to embark or having embarked upon what he calls an aggressive and warlike policy, involving warlike operations in South Africa, and he says that this war policy has been rejected by the Cape Government and people. Sir, both these statements are absolutely inaccurate. [Ministerial cheers.] The policy of the Government in South Africa is exactly the same now as it has been from the first. Their objects are the same. The only thing that has changed, to a certain extent, are the circumstances. The circumstances in South Africa have changed to some extent. The policy of the Government remains the same, and that policy of the Government is to maintain its obligations, not to engage in any aggressive operations whatsoever; not to attack the independence of a State which, even in diplomatic language, can be termed a friendly State, but to maintain its own rights and the rights of the nation. [Loud

Ministerial cheers.] I hoped that this policy would continue to be, as it has hitherto been, a non-Party policy, supported from all sides of the House. That hope has altogether disappeared in face of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman —[cheers]—and now I challenge him and his Party to raise the issue. [Loud Ministerial cheers.] Let us know where we are. [Ministerial cheers and Opposition cries of "Crewe."] Let us know at the earliest possible date upon what point they are prepared to take issue with us. [Ministerial cheers.] Are they prepared to take issue with us when we say that, while we observe our own obligations, we intend that the obligations which are held towards us shall also be maintained? [Cheers.] What is it that is now in question between us and the Government of the Transvaal? It is not any interference on our part in the internal affairs of the Transvaal; not any attack by us upon the Convention to which the Transvaal willingly assented. The difference between us arises from the fact that on more than one occasion the Transvaal Government have broken the Convention, and we are calling upon them in friendly and conciliatory terms to give us satisfaction. And this is the opportunity the right hon. Gentleman takes to tell them in effect that they are not to give us satisfaction; to tell them in effect it is we who are aggressive—[cheers]—that it is we who have taken the initiative, and that they will have the support of the Government and the people of Cape Colony, because that is his second statement. [Cheers.] Upon what does he base that? I suppose upon the telegrams, and he must have been much more acute than I am if he understands entirely their importance and meaning. What I see in those telegrams is that the Cape Parliament practically unanimously has declared that they are determined that the obligations on both sides shall be observed.

Sir W. HARCOURT: Peaceably.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is desirable that peace should be preserved. We hold that as strongly as the right hon. Gentleman, but we do not hold that peace can be preserved by telling the Transvaal they can break their obligations with impunity. [Cheers.] That is practically the policy which the right hon. Gentleman has expounded. [Loud Ministerial cheers.] I defy him to point to anything in the Dispatches before the House—which are open for discussion—that can, by any strained interpretation, be assumed to be in any way provocative to the Transvaal. [Cheers.] We have called their attention in conciliatory language to the breaches of the Convention which have taken place. We have assumed that they would be willing to meet our demands for satisfaction, and while the matter is still pending, and under the consideration of the Transvaal Government, the right hon. Gentleman takes this opportunity of saying we are pursuing an aggressive policy, and shall not have his support.

Sir W. HARCOURT: You have come for £200,000. [Opposition cheers.]

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: What nonsense! [Loud Ministerial cheers.] We come for £200,000 after we know, and the right hon. Gentleman knows, that the Transvaal has come for a million—for hundreds and hundreds of thousands. [Cheers and Opposition cries of "Where?"] The Transvaal has been arming to the knowledge of the House and of everybody—[An hon. Member: "What about the raid?"]—to an extent which is absolutely unjustifiable by any ordinary policy of defence. We have not complained, we have not thought it consistent with our dignity to make any complaint whatsoever. The result of that has been that at the present moment the armaments of the Transvaal are altogether disproportionate to the defensive resources of our possessions in South Africa. Our forces in South Africa were established there and the numbers were settled at a time when these enormous armaments had not even been thought of. Now, after an amount of very considerably more than a million of money has already been expended, when armaments are still going on, when batteries of artillery, Maxim guns, millions of rounds of ammunition, and hundreds of thousands of rifles have been to our knowledge imported into the Transvaal, ordered from foreign countries and from this country—under these circumstances what is this country to do? Is it an aggressive or a warlike operation if we think it necessary to reinforce our garrison at the Cape and to bring it up to something nearer a fair proportion in regard to those operations to which I have referred? [Cheers.]

And yet, Sir, it is under these circumstances, when this extremely modest demand is made for a sum which will be sufficient to send a brigade of artillery and an additional regiment to the Cape, that the right hon. Gentleman comes down here and in turgid language talks about an aggressive and warlike policy which the feeling of the Cape will entirely repudiate. [Ministerial cheers.] Sir, I do not believe the feeling of the Cape will repudiate it in the least. I believe, on the contrary, the feeling of every loyal British subject at the Cape will be one of gratitude and satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government understand and recognise their position as the representatives of the paramount Power, and that they are determined, in words that I have used again and again, to maintain in their integrity all the rights which we have under the Convention. [Loud Ministerial cheers.]

Mr. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) asked if there was to be a permanent strengthening of the garrison at the Cape?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is only intended at the present moment to increase the regular garrison in South Africa by a brigade of artillery—three batteries, that is—and an additional regiment.

Mr. WARNER said he considered that £200,000 would be a great deal more than enough for taking such a number of troops from England and keeping them at the Cape for a few months. If it was an increase of the Army that would account for it, but if it was merely a transfer of troops from England to the Cape then this was a larger sum than was required for that purpose.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Of course, I am not responsible for the Estimate. That is an estimate for the transfer of that force to the Cape, and for maintaining them there. I regard it as substantially and practically a permanent increase of the garrison.

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) expressed surprise at the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition with regard to this miserable sum of £200,000. If the right hon. Gentleman had read the last Blue-book concerning affairs in South Africa, as he had done, he thought he would have been struck, as he had been struck, by the repeated occasions on which the Colonial Secretary had condoned and forgiven repeated undoubted breaches of the Convention by the Transvaal. ["Hear, hear!"] Though treaties had been signed and completed and ratified in direct breach of that Convention, the Colonial Secretary had nevertheless advised Her Majesty to agree to those treaties.

Sir W. HARCOURT: The hon. Gentleman has omitted to observe, perhaps, that I am a member of the South African Committee, and I have heard the Colonial Secretary there. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial laughter.]

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES failed to observe the relevance of that remark—[cheers]—and suggested that perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would pay even so humble a Member as himself the compliment of listening to him in silence. [Opposition laughter.] He repeated that it was impossible to read that Blue-book without being struck with the patience exhibited by the Colonial Secretary in face of repeated breaches of the Convention undertaken, he did not hesitate to say, for the purpose of provocation to this country. It was written in every line of the Dispatches which reached them from the Transvaal that these breaches were openly and avowedly made for the very purpose of provoking a strong feeling of irritation in this country, and when their attention was called to the breaches they dealt with the matter with the utmost insolence. That was the only word that could possibly be used. ["Hear, hear!"] He yielded to no one in that House in the feeling he had that it would be a most tremendous misfortune for this country to be engaged in a war with the Transvaal. [Opposition cheers.] He was most profoundly convinced that such a war could lead to no good result either for the Transvaal itself or for this country, and he earnestly trusted the Colonial Secretary might be able to avoid anything even approaching such a disastrous termination to the correspondence—and, if he might use the word, the disputes—that had been going on between the Colonial Office and the Transvaal up to this time. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought the Colonial Secretary might be able to avoid war; and, in his opinion, if any man could avoid it—if any man were competent to deal with such difficult subjects as Dutch statesmen under Boer control—it was the right hon. Gentleman below him. [Cheers.] But undoubtedly his difficulties were not diminished, but very largely increased, by such speeches as that which they had just heard—[cheers]—by a speech announcing to the Boers that, right or wrong, they should have the support of Gentlemen who sat on that side of the House—[Opposition cries of "Oh!" and Ministerial cheers]—and that, whatever happened, they would not want friends to denounce the Government of this country, even if they were driven into a struggle which they firmly intended to avoid if it were at all possible. [Cheers.] That was a digression—[laughter]—into which he was tempted by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He came now to the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Here again, he must say, the right hon. Gentleman opposite showed a certain want of appreciation. As to the First Lord of the Admiralty, he delivered him into the hands of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. [Laughter.] He would rather see that right hon. Gentleman at the Admiralty than at the Exchequer, because he could not forget that he was a first-class sailor, but he did not think he was anything like so good a financier, especially from the point of view of the Death Duties. He could not forget that it was the right hon. Gentleman who exaggerated that monstrous assumption, which was enshrined in the Finance Act, that a man was dead three months before he died. That was Mr. Gladstone's assumption, but the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty exaggerated it into twelve months. He could not forgive him that—he should never forgive him. [Laughter.] Now with regard to the Death Duties themselves. He had endured the taunts of the right hon. Gentleman opposite in silence and in patience, because he knew his day would come. [Laughter.] He predicted evasions; the right hon. Gentleman opposite ridiculed them. There had been, as the right hon. Gentleman knew too well, many evasions. There had been some evasions in which he himself could scarcely have believed had they not been proved before him by irrefutable evidence—evasions to which, perhaps, the attention of the House would subsequently be called, and which, he ventured to think, would provoke amazement in the breasts of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He had always predicted that one effect of this Act would be to reduce the amount of capital brought into charge under the Finance Act of 1894. What had occurred? In their Report for last year, 1895-6, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue said:—

> "In our Report of last year we called attention to the great falling off in the amount of 'personalty situate in the United Kingdom passing by will or intestacy,' whether subject to Estate Duty or Probate Duty. The amount of such property in 1894-5 was only £141,421,000, as compared with £159,688,000 in 1893-4. At the same time we combated the notion that this falling off was due mainly to evasion of the duty consequent upon the higher rates imposed by the Finance Act of 1894. The correctness of our contention appears to be borne out by the results of the past year, in which the amount of personalty of this description has once more risen to £162,569,000, being £21,148,000 in excess of 1894-5, and £2,881,000 in excess of 1893-4."

And then they went on to say they were convinced that evasion was carried on, and that it would be carried on. Mark the result of the present year as shown by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Whereas this personalty in 1891 was £190,000,000; in 1892, £160,000,000; and in 1893, £159,500,000: in 1894-5, as the very first result of the Finance Act, it fell to £141,400,000; in 1895-6 it did rise to £163,500,000, but in this year the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it had again fallen by £10,000,000 or to £153,000,000. This was a most pregnant fact, and he warned the Committee that that diminution had not stopped. On the contrary, it would go on increasing. He never expected it to reach to a very great height at this particular time. He expected it to reach to its greatest height at the end of the century. He confidently expected that at the beginning of the next century it would be found that there had been a most serious diminution of revenue under the head of Death Duties, and at the same time a most serious increase of the hardships and injustices inflicted under that Act. Then the moment would have arrived for a Chancellor of the Exchequer to stand at that Table and call for a repeal of that Act and a return to the proper principles of taxation. He would like to give four sets of figures in corroboration and amplification of his conjecture that personalty under the Finance Act was likely to decrease year by year. He moved for and obtained a most valuable Return, showing the amount of personalty assessed in the last five years under seven distinct heads. In 1891-2, the influenza year, the total amount of personalty assessed under all heads was £410,000,000; in 1892-3, it was £367,000,000; in 1893-4, it was £350,000,000; in 1894-5, the first year of the Finance Act, it fell to £280,500,000; and in 1895-6, it fell to £273,700,000. What it would be for 1896-7 he did not know, but he ventured to predict a still further decrease. He must explain that this was the total amount of personalty assessed under every head, and some of it assessed twice or three times over. It did not represent the property. The sums he had named represented far more than the property which was assessed. It represented the total amount of personalty in each year on which they were enabled to assess duty, and consequently he claimed it as a fair figure for comparison between one year and another. The remarkable diminutions from year to year that had taken place since the passing of the Finance Act were such as to make even the right hon. Gentleman opposite reflect and, perhaps, in time, would cause him even to repent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave them three reasons why the Death Duties did not suffer so much last year as he had expected. There was a fourth reason, which he ventured to think was perhaps the greatest reason of all. That was the continued prevalence of high prices. The high prices of what were called "gilt-edged" securities had continued to a very large extent this year, but the moment there was a fall in those securities they would have a more than proportionate fall in such duties as the Death Duties, for the reason that those duties were more especially high upon the holders of these "gilt-edged" securities. Under the old system of death duties there was nothing so certain as that the estimate would be verified, or nearly so; but since the passing of the Finance Act a condition of the most absolute uncertainty had been created. There was a mistake in the Estimate of one and a half million last year, and of one million this year. Such a thing never occurred before.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The hon. Member forgets the Succession Duty of 1853, which never produced one-half what is was expected to produce. With regard to the Death Duty of 1894 it was estimated to produce one million in the first year, and it produced that sum within a few thousand pounds. It was estimated to produce ultimately four millions a year, and it has produced that sum almost exactly in both succeeding years. [Cheers.]

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the right hon. Gentleman could not ride off in that way. He began to suspect that the right hon. Gentleman was the author of a letter in The Times signed "H." [Laughter.] There was an accuracy of expression and at the same time an inaccuracy of suggestion in that letter which, at the time, made him think it might have been written by the right hon. Gentleman. He was now confirmed in that opinion. [Laughter.] In two years a mistake had been made in the Estimate.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Not by me.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said he was dealing with the years, not with the personages, and he asserted that the uncertainty that had attended these duties was most remarkable. He observed in the letter signed "H." the remark that, because the Death Duties last year were 14 millions, and this year nearly 14 millions, that showed how near an approximation it was to the original estimate. But the original estimate was not for this year or for last year; it was an estimate of the final outcome of the Death Duties. He was profoundly convinced that the Finance Act was calculated to produce year by year increasing uncertainties in the estimates of revenue as compared with the actual yield; and that when it came into full operation the amount derived would not be the 14 millions which the right hon. Gentleman expected, but a very much smaller sum, while the feeling of hardship entertained would be such as to force the House to reconsider what he could not but think an unfortunate fiscal change. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) expressed regret at the Chancellor of the Exchequer's allusion to the position occupied by the Crown lands in reference to the taxation and finance of the country. It was a return to the high Tory view which he thought had become extinct of recent years. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the payments in respect of agricultural rating having been considerably less than the estimate made by the Local Government Board. But the Local Government Board in issuing their Order acted under the instructions of the Treasury, whose assent was necessary under the Act. By the limit which was fixed the great mass of the small freeholders of the country were defrauded of the advantages which Parliament intended to give them. In a parish in his own constituency, where the rates were now 8s. 6d., and in the next half-year would be 9s. in the pound, there were 300 small freeholders who had, through the interposition of the Treasury in the preparation of the Local Government Board circular, been deprived of the benefits of the Rating Act. With regard to the Post Office reforms, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman had said nothing with regard to the labour side of the Post Office problem. ["Hear, hear!"] The Post Office was the largest employer of direct labour in the world, and although there had been some improvement in recent years, yet the Post Office was far from occupying the position of a model employer. The effect of the proposed reforms would be that an additional weight would have to be carried in the rural districts. At the present time auxiliary postmen had to make long rounds in the early hours of winter mornings, starting with a weight of 35lb. He hoped that the Government in effecting their reforms would consider in a liberal spirit the services of these men. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I omitted to say that a considerable part of the sum I estimated will go in improving the position of the rural postmen, and undoubtedly some will go in providing carts where these are needed. [Cheers.]

*SIR C. DILKE said he was glad to have elicited that statement. With regard to the additional £200,000 to be spent in respect of our position as paramount Power in South Africa, he could not take the extremely serious view of that proposal that was taken by either the Leader of the Opposition or the Member for King's Lynn. If there was the remotest intention in the mind of the Government to embark on a war in South Africa, £200,000 would be merely a ridiculous item of expenditure. He believed that the South African Republic in the course of the year just expired had spent on warlike stores alone at least twice that sum. In face of that fact they would exaggerate if they were to anticipate that the Government intended war in South Africa. But, if in the minds of heated and excited writers in the Press there was any notion of the kind, they ought to be warned in time against the suggestion that this country would be likely to engage in a war which would be so profoundly unpopular as a war in South Africa for any but a very grave cause. Of course, if the South African Republic desired to drive this country into war there were steps which they might conceivably take which would render war between the two countries inevitable, but he felt persuaded that no such step would be taken by the Republic. Upon anything like a doubtful or confused issue such a war would be one of great unpopularity, and one in which the sympathies of all the Powers in the world would be opposed to this country. All he hoped was that Her Majesty's Government would by the prudence of their language—[Opposition cheers]—abstain, not in the interests of Party, but of the whole country, from giving the smallest colour or support to those excited utterances which occasionally found their place in the Press, and on the part of some of their less weighty supporters. [Cheers.] With regard to the £500,000 for the Navy, he was not able to look upon that provision as necessitated by the fresh events to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred. He had always held that our Navy should be predominant, not only over the two Powers usually named, but over other Powers besides. As he was one of those who found fault with the shipbuilding programme of the year on the ground of its insufficiency, he cordially supported and approved of the proposed expenditure of an additional amount. He only wished the sum proposed had been larger.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) expressed his regret at hearing the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his review of the last 60 years, rehearse almost word for word one of the stalest leaflets of the Cobden Club. [Laughter.] His right hon. Friend did not even incidentally refer to the introduction of steam and electricity and its applications, and he omitted to take cognisance of the fact that other countries which pursued a fiscal system precisely the opposite of our own had made relatively far greater progress. The Chancellor of the Exchequer talked of 700 millions sterling as representing the trade of this country. His right hon. Friend stepped very lightly over the fact that of that sum 441 millions consisted of imports—[Opposition cheers]—and only 240 millions of exports. In other words, we were 200 millions annually to the bad. [Laughter.] The First Lord of the Treasury himself must have seen, almost within the limits of his own constituency, mills being pulled down and the plant carted bodily to other countries. That meant that British capital was expended no longer in paying wages to British artisans, but to foreigners. He hoped this "redress of the balance," to which the First Lord of the Treasury referred in speeches outside, would be duly appreciated by the wage-earners of this country. The fact was no person who looked dispassionately at our financial position could say we were safe in going on piling expenditure on the top of expenditure, and continually relying exclusively upon our existing fiscal system. Did the Chancellor of the Exchequer think that expenditure in the future would be curtailed? He thought that it would rather be in the direction of expansion. And was it proposed in this event to add to the already high income tax? The Death Duties were not capable of expansion, and therefore the income tax was the only resource of a Chancellor of the Exchequer. He should like to see recourse had to sources of revenue which would provide money and give a stimulus to some of the trades and industries of the country. It was all very well to say that the working classes would not submit to any tax on the necessaries of life, but 4½ millions were already levied on articles which were not produced at home. From a financial point of view, these 4½ millions would be easily made up by a recurrence to a sounder system of finance. A duty of 2s. on corn would produce more than that now raised by the taxes on tea, coffee, cocoa, chicory, and dried fruits. Could any hon. Member say that the working classes would be injured by a transfer of these taxes from the one commodity to the other? This system of depending practically on one source of revenue for any further demands which might be made on the Exchequer was dangerous in the extreme, and he should not hesitate to urge at any time the desirableness of establishing a sounder system of finance.

MR. LEONARD COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin) could not join in the pathetic remonstrance of his right hon. Friend. He did not find it to be a bad thing that we, by the exportation of 250 millions' worth of commodities should be able to get back 480 millions. It was rather a good bargain, and was a benefit to the wage-earners at home. Nor did he see that his right hon. Friend was justified in asserting that no one wanted to invest capital in this country. It was difficult to reconcile that statement with the fact that the rate of interest was lower in this country than in any other country. As to the suggestion that the working classes would gain by the imposition of a 2s. duty on corn, and a possible abolition of the duty on tea, coffee, and cocoa, he should like to see the working man who would accept the change. Personally he had not met him. He hoped that the greatest attention would be paid to the interesting comparison of the Chancellor of the Exchequer between the beginning of Her Majesty's reign and the finances of today. The revenue then was 53 millions, and the expenditure 52 millions. Now the expenditure was 104 millions. How was that expenditure allotted? Of the 52 millions at the beginning of the reign, 29 millions went in the involuntary charge of interest and cost of management of the debt; only 16 millions went to the Army and the Navy. [Cheers.] Now out of 104 millions something like 16 millions went to the cost of the interest and management of the debt, whereas the cost of the Army and Navy had risen from 16 millions to 42 millions, India being left out of account. In addition to that, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed out of the surplus to allot another half-million to the Navy. He held most strongly the necessity of upholding the Navy, and that it should be competent to meet any enemy or combination of enemies we had reasonably to encounter. He asked the Government and the right hon. Gentleman who had preceded them, however, whether there was no alternative policy possible save that of copying and emulating foreign Powers in the increase of our naval and military arms. As the late Lord Beaconsfield said years ago, the expenditure of a Government was the measure of its policy. A Government that developed a policy of mistrust would beget and multiply mistrust. Among civilised Powers there ought to be some method of negotiating and coming to agreement, and the first step to take to make that possible was to banish the sense of mistrust from one's mind. If we were not so suspected we might find other Powers ready to enter into satisfactory negotiations with us. Could we review the policy of Governments in recent years and read the language of Ministers of the Crown—he did not care on what side they were—and compare their policy and language with the policy and language of Ministers of the Crown at the beginning of the reign, without seeing that there had been a change for the worse, and that we were now constantly "biting our thumbs" at our neighbours, instead of cultivating friendly relations with them? Lord Salisbury was himself as cleanhanded in this matter as any man who had been engaged in public affairs for many years past, but there appeared to be a peaceful spirit running through that Legislature and the country, encouraged, he was sorry to say, by a similar spirit abroad, which was the justification and excuse for it here; and the way to meet that spirit abroad was to try to get rid of it ourselves. In the early part of the reign wiser and really more patriotic policy prevailed. It was this policy of mistrust—this policy of "biting our thumbs" at those with whom we happened for the moment not to be in cordial relations—which filled his mind with the greatest anxiety. With reference to the proposed expenditure of £200,000—in connection with which proposal they had had so deplorable a scene earlier in the evening—he had to say that that was a ridiculously small sum to ask for if the Government really contemplated war with the Transvaal. The expenditure involved in a policy of that kind would be measured by millions and not by tens of thousands. But if the Government did not contemplate something aggressive, why indulge in this petty display? [Opposition cheers.] He had been sorry to hear the Secretary for the Colonies refer to the money spent by the Transvaal Government in the erection of forts and in procuring artillery and munitions of war during the last 12 months. No doubt it was true that large sums of money had been so spent, but he did not believe that any person in South Africa dreamed that the Government of the Transvaal had any aggressive intentions—[Opposition cheers]—in that process of arming. [Laughter.] If Mr. Rhodes himself were here he would tell them that the Transvaal Government did not dream of making war. They were preparing to meet war, but they were not preparing to make war except by way of defence. They had no motive or desire for aggression. The reason why they were preparing for defence was, of course, largely explained by the fact that they had been attacked—[Opposition cheers]—and after the attack that had been made upon them such language as had been used by the hon. Member for King's Lynn that evening would not be regarded by them as indicating a friendly spirit. When language was employed such as they had heard in that Debate, could it be wondered at that there should be this inclination to arm on the part of the Boers? The demand of the Government for this £200,000, and the policy which appeared to accompany it, seemed to him to betoken some anticipation of what might be the results of the investigations of the South Africa Committee. He protested against the notion that they could promote peace in South Africa by uttering language of a hostile nature here, and making preparations which were wholly inadequate if war was contemplated. The members of the Cape House of Assembly without exception desired the maintenance of peace, and deprecated the suggestion of war. Whilst those were their views, they also deprecated the intervention of any foreign Power; but nobody in South Africa desired any foreign Power to intervene. Certainly the Government of the Transvaal Republic would not dream of bringing in a European Power to be their masters, or even to help them to fight Great Britain, for they valued their independence too highly. He did not wish to aggravate the situation by any words of his, and he was very sorry that they had anticipated a discussion which must be conducted in a more serious manner—[Ministerial cheers]—and with better preparation a few weeks hence; but he thought the Leader of the House would admit that the language which had been uttered justified some few words in reply. He regretted that they should have heard from the hon. Member for King's Lynn denunciations of a people with whom we were still in friendly relations. [Mr. Gibson Bowles: "I indulged in no denunciations!"] The hon. Member spoke of the insolence of the Transvaal Government and of repeated treaty violations, which the Boers denied.

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said that when he used the word "insolence" he was referring to the tone of certain dispatches from the Transvaal Republic. Their tone certainly did seem to him to justify the use of the word.

Mr. COURTNEY said that when the hon. Member talked about "insolence of tone," that was an appreciation of his own. The other side did not think their tone insolent. It was just to this certainty of conviction that we were always in the right and the other side always in the wrong that he demurred, for it was likely to aggravate a situation already sufficiently grave. ["Hear, hear!"]

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I do not know by what unfortunate fate it is that the speeches of Gentlemen who wish to be thought the advocates of peace have always an effect so opposed to the speakers' declared intention. [Cheers.] I cannot imagine two speeches more calculated to aggravate and make more difficult the relations between this country and the Transvaal than the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and the speech of my right hon. Friend who has just sat down. The speech of the Leader of the Opposition has already been dealt with. As to the speech of my right hon. Friend, I am astonished that he should have thought it desirable to rise in his place as a supporter of the Government to explain that we cannot have the intention that we declare we have—the intention, namely, of sending out this small force for defensive purposes, and defensive purposes alone. [Mr. Courtney said that the right hon. Gentleman had not understood him correctly.] The right hon. Gentleman has many times assumed that the object of the Government was a provocative object. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman says that the step the Government are taking is useless for aggression, that it is not wanted for defence, and that it must, therefore, be intended for provocation. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. COURTNEY: I never used the word intended. I spoke of the fact, not of the design. People may engage in conduct which will produce consequences which they do not themselves intend or foresee.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Surely, if the right hon. Gentleman goes that length, anything more calculated to make this defensive action on the part of the Government to be regarded by the Boers as a deliberate act of provocation—anything more calculated to produce that result than his speech cannot be conceived. ["Hear, hear!"] As a matter of fact, he has done his best, I am sure unintentionally, by the speech he has just delivered, to inflame those feelings which all would desire to smooth, and to increase those difficulties which all would desire to allay; and instead of accepting frankly the statement of the Government that those troops were sent out of precaution alone, that we are absolutely innocent of any aggressive purpose, that we have no desire and never had any desire to do anything but maintain our actual existing and admitted rights, and that we of all people in the world would regard not merely as a national, but as a Party disaster the breaking out of war with the Transvaal, he has by his speech done his best to hide this purpose from the public. ["Hear, hear!"] The brief statement of policy which I have made represents accurately the tone and temper of the Government, and if the Committee and the country will only take it from me in the spirit in which I have made it, I am convinced that something, at all events, will have been done to promote the maintenance of that peace which, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman, he is not the only person in the House to desire. [Cheers.]

Sir W. HARCOURT: I am extremely glad to recognise the tone which the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has adopted. [Cheers.] I hope his statement will have the effect of healing the soreness which exists in this country, and, what is much more desirable, in South Africa. ["Hear, hear!"] But when I remember that a gentleman with whom I am personally acquainted and for whom I have the greatest respect, the other day before his constituents said that, from what he had heard and knew, there was going to be immediate war with the Transvaal—[cries of "Name!" and a voice "Williams"]—I will not mention any name, but I refer to a most respected Member of the Party opposite—when, I say, I remember that, I think the time has come when something should be said to remove that impression. That such an impression does exist at the Cape of Good Hope no one acquainted with the state of things there can doubt for a moment. Nobody can doubt that the language Mr. Rhodes has held both there and in this country tends in that direction. Nobody can doubt that within the last month or two the impression has existed that the policy of Mr. Rhodes in this matter has had the support of the Colonial Secretary, and I should be very glad to know that that is not the case. I am bound to say that my experience upon the South African Committee has led me to believe that it was a joint policy. The whole of the Debate in the Cape Parliament turned on that point, and one of the principal supporters of the Resolution that was moved in that Parliament said that the meaning of it was that "we do not mean to support the policy of Mr. Chamberlain." That was the impression—that the object was, I will not say invasion or aggression, but that the object was a policy of menace. ["Hear, hear!"] What my right hon. Friend opposite has said is perfectly true. He has spoken of the arming of the Boers. How can you wonder that they should be arming when it has been admitted before the Committee that Mr. Rhodes and Dr. Jameson had distinctly formed a plan for seizing the armaments of the Boers at Pretoria? ["Hear, hear!"] How can you wonder at their taking measures in self-defence? As to the idea that the Boers of the Transvaal intend to attack the British Government in South Africa, it is absurd. I am very glad to have heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I hope that his disavowal will go out to the Cape. I welcome his healing words, and I hope they will convince the people of this country, and especially the people in South Africa, that England does not entertain any such suicidal and wicked policy as would encourage a racial war in South Africa, and which would be at once the greatest injury and disgrace to the Empire. ["Hear, hear!"] And remember this—the hon. Member for King's Lynn talked about breaches of the Convention. I have read the allegation of these breaches of the Convention, and to my mind they seem very doubtful; but, Sir, there is a breach of the Convention, the grossest and the most flagrant that ever occurred, and that is the breach of the Convention in the raid and in the promotion of an armed insurrection in Pretoria. ["Hear, hear!"] That has not yet been referred to. It seems to me that before we take the mote out of the eye of those in the Transvaal we had better take the beam out of our own eye. [Cheers.] I am extremely sorry that it was thought necessary to introduce this matter into the Budget. It is really no part of it. The natural course of proceeding would have been to settle the expenditure of the country on a general basis, and if there was any temporary necessity for an armament of this description, it would have been perfectly easy to have dealt with it by a supplementary Estimate. Why the general finances of the country should be embarrassed by such a thorny and difficult question as this I cannot imagine. We have had no explanation of it, and we cannot dispose of it now. ["Hear, hear!"] I am sorry I omitted in my former speech to express my approval of the reforms the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes in connection with the Post Office, but I only rose now to say that I welcome the tone of the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, and that I hope his words may be reported in South Africa. ["Hear, hear!"]

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I wish first to say that, as there is some inconvenience in discussing this matter on the Budget, I will endeavour to give as early a Friday as possible for the introduction of a supplementary Estimate, when we can discuss the question in a regular manner. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.) said he rose to call attention to a question he had endeavoured to bring before the House by way of a Bill. The subject was no doubt familiar to many Members in consequence of the numerous petitions that had been received from traders in the country in reference to it—he meant the abolition of the plate licence. At present it was necessary for a trader to take out a licence before he could sell any article containing 6 dwt. of silver. The duty was in the nature of a restriction on trade, and of a kind of protection which both sides of the House would wish to see removed. It had been pointed out that the only two arguments in favour of the retention of the licence were that it limited dealing in gold and silver articles to a small number of persons, and that it assisted the police in the detection of persons who stole such articles. There could hardly be any justification for the continued imposition of a duty which produced the trivial sum of £50,000 a year, and which hindered trade in gold and silver articles. It moreover encouraged the production and importation into this country of shoddy articles of silver plate, which just saved the requirements of the revenue. He was at a loss to understand how there could be any opposition to the abolition of the duty, except on the part of the larger traders in these articles, who wished to keep the trade in their own hands. There was only one other point to which he wished to refer as representing a London constituency. He wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer could have seen his way to raising the minimum on which the income tax would have to be paid. This was a matter which closely affected the working and middle classes, particularly numbers of poor traders. He did not think the Exchequer would lose much, seeing the cost of collection. He also suggested that the sale of cigars and tobacco should be allowed on the railways and omnibuses.

*Sir JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) said the hon. Member for Thanet, who had recently addressed the Committee, in saying that no one would invest a 6d. in this country, could hardly have read the admirable reports from the Board of Trade. There was a little book which came out every year, called the "Statistical Abstract," which hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to study. It showed that 17 millions had been invested during each of the last 15 years in one great industry—the railways of the United Kingdom, and yet the hon. Member for Thanet had said that there was no one who would invest a sixpence! With regard to the proposals of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer as regards Telegraphs and Post Office, he was sure they would be welcomed throughout the country. There were many trades suffering as well as agriculture. What they were most suffering from was, he would not say the policy of Her Majesty's Government, but the unsettled state of Eastern Europe, which had no doubt done great damage to trade. But for that they would have been still more prosperous. He was glad to hear his right hon. Friend say that he did hope that some of this expenditure, which he so much regretted, would come to an end some day—that expenditure which, as the hon. Member for Bodmin said, they were constantly demanding for naval and military affairs, an expenditure which had gone up from 16 to 40 millions. Now, no sooner is there a small surplus than £500,000 of it is handed over to the Admiralty in order to continue those armaments which were so detrimental to the peace of the world. He agreed with the Leader of the Opposition that it is an enormous pity that the £200,000 for additional troops to the Cape, which in itself is neither here nor there, was named at all as an item in the Budget. He feared that it was a fatal mistake, especially after the cross-examination in the Committee taken up so warmly by the Secretary for the Colonies, and the papers and letters written upon it. He was afraid this would tend rather to the war of the world than the peace of the world. ["Hear, hear!"] Whenever these increases were made here, they saw at once the foreign papers urging their Governments to follow the course that England was taking. He believed these countries watched and followed the course that England might take—if we built more ships they followed suit—if we were to adopt another policy, in all probability that policy might and would be adopted by them. This Budget of £103,000,000 was to give 42½ millions of it to the purposes of the Army and Navy. As to the subsidies to local taxation from Imperial funds, he thought every Chancellor of the Exchequer deplored the thing in principle, for the principle appeared to him utterly wrong—["hear, hear!"]—and was actually raised by taxation upon the lower middle and working classes to save taxation, which would otherwise fall on those more able to bear the burden.

COLONEL MILWARD (Warwick, Stratford-on-Avon) believed that the postal and telegraph changes would prove of great advantage, not only to the upper classes but to a large extent to the working classes, especially in sparsely-inhabited districts. He wished particularly to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the reduction in the rates as to parcels. Up to now the rates in this country were larger than in other countries, notably in France and Germany, which were largely competing countries with us. The proposed reduction would place them in a better position than France was, but not better than Germany. We should not be in as good a position as the Germans, but it must be remembered that the German Government required that post waggons should run free of charge, and, therefore, the rate for parcels could be considerably reduced. Taking that into consideration they had every reason to be satisfied and gratified with the changes announced to-night, changes which affected both the agricultural and commercial classes. The changes would do a great deal to bring producers of dairy articles and consumers nearer together, with a result beneficial to both classes. He did not think the Government or the House generally recognised to what a large extent commerce was carried on by means of the Parcels Post. Only the other day he learned that one firm, a Member of which sat in this House, sent every day 1,300 parcels by Parcels Post. He trusted that the advantages they had heard of to-night would soon be extended to the foreign Parcels Post, and they had every reason to believe that would be the case. That certainly would go a long way towards helping us to compete with producers abroad. He did not suppose that in consequence of such a change the commerce of England would reach the point his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sheffield desired to see it attain, but that and other similar reforms would greatly assist English commerce in its international transactions. Before he resumed his seat he desired to express regret that it had not been possible to reduce the income tax by a penny at least. If we embarked in war we must look very largely to the income tax to bear the burden, and if in time of peace we kept the tax at war rate what were we to do when we had to meet the expense of a war? A 6d. income tax was bearable, but an 8d. tax was always unbearable in time of peace. He was certain it would be wise to reduce the income tax to 6d., so that we might be in a sounder financial position if we had to go to war. One, however, could not help being satisfied at the ease with which the country bore the present enormous expenditure. It was only a few years ago that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were denounced for proposing an expenditure of £80,000,000. The expenditure during next year was estimated at £101,000,000, and the country appeared to be able to bear it with the greatest ease. No testimony to the country's prosperity could be greater than that.

*MR. ALBERT SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs) rose to express gratification at the wonderful statement as to the financial condition of the country which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put before the House. He believed that statement would impress the vast majority of hon. Members with the wisdom of those who made this country one of free imports. From one remark which fell from the hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield it would seem that he at least was still unconverted. [Sir HOWARD VINCENT: "Hear, hear!"] He was afraid that the hon. and gallant Gentleman and those who thought with him did not pay sufficient heed to the enormous increase of home consumption. He was connected with a branch of commerce that had to meet a great deal of foreign competition, but he believed that if a return could be obtained of the gross tonnage produced by home manufactures 20 years ago as compared with to-day, it would be found that in spite of foreign competition the industry of which he spoke had made enormous advance. He listened to that part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech which dealt with postal reforms with peculiar pleasure. He felt that hitherto the improvements in postal arrangements had chiefly benefited the large towns, and, therefore, he was glad that now the rural districts were to be benefited. There was one suggestion he had to make, and that was that the Post Office authorities should take into consideration the advisability of carrying passengers in those districts unprovided with the ordinary means of conveyance. In many districts of the Continent the Post Office provided passenger carrying accommodation, an example which he felt could with advantage be imitated here.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said that unfortunately he had not heard the whole of the speech of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and more especially that part in which he referred to the views which he himself, in common with many others, had long held. He had heard the greater part of the statement, however, and he was very much disappointed that his right hon. Friend did not take advantage of the present opportunity to do something for the manufactures and industries of the country. The postal reforms would very possibly do something in this direction, but they must not forget that the present Government was pledged to devote itself as far as it could to fostering the interests of industry and labour in the country. He pointed out that in 1841 the Customs duties, raised upon nine classes of articles, amounted to £23,341,000, while in the present year, 21½ millions were to be raised upon eight classes of articles. The right hon. Member for the Bodmin division of Cornwall had taken exception to the suggestions which were made by his right hon. Friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet, and expressed the opinion that the working men of this country would not tolerate any such system as he advocated. He would refer the right hon. Member for the Bodmin division to a newspaper published in his constituency, the Cornwall Gazette. On the occasion of a dinner of the Cobden Club last year, at which the right hon. Member took the chair, that newspaper published the following passage:—

> "The iron industry is decaying, and America, which adheres to the fallacy of Protection, is rapidly beating us out of the field. In cutlery, England was mistress of the markets of the world some 14 years ago; in 1894 our exports were short of two millions in value, while German exports were in the neighbourhood of four millions. Our cotton exports in the same year were nearly eight millions less than in 1874, and our exports of woollen goods in 1874 were 28 millions as against 18 millions in 1894, whilst we imported these goods to the value of 11 millions. Our import of silk goods is eight times greater than our exports. Our sugar industry has been destroyed by foreign bounties. The McKinley tariff is killing our tin-plate manufacture. It is such facts as these that one looks to Mr. Courtney to explain."

He would suggest that the right hon. Member should consult the opinion of the working men in his own constituency on the subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in detailing the progress which had been made in many respects during the present reign, had altogether ignored the relatively greater progress which had been made by foreign nations under an entirely different system. An official Paper laid upon the Table in 1891 by his right hon. Friend, who was then President of the Board of Trade, showed that while each £100 of English foreign trade in 1854 became under the free import system £276 15s. 6d. in 35 years, in the principal Continental nations, under a system of Protection, each £100 in the same period became £364 10s. 1d. That showed that foreign nations under an entirely different fiscal system had in the last 35 years made relatively much greater progress than we had. The present system was entirely against the investment of capital in this country. He contended that his right hon. Friend the Member for Thanet was absolutely right when he said that the present condition of affairs tended to diminish the investment of capital in labour-employing British enterprises. The hon. Baronet who sat for one of the divisions of Durham cited against this the £800,000,000 sterling which was invested in the railways of this country, and he considered these were manufacturing enterprises. He did not minimise the great benefits which the railways were to the country, but they gave preferential rates to foreigners, carrying foreign goods for less than they carried British produce, arable or manufacturing. In the construction of the new railway from Waterloo to the City the rolling stock was being obtained from abroad and the labour from America. He admitted that the present fiscal system was exceedingly advantageous to people with fixed incomes, who could obtain luxuries at far less cost than they would otherwise be able to do, but to people whose capital consisted of their labour, and who had to work for their daily bread, it was injurious in the highest degree. In 1841, 934,000 persons were in receipt of outdoor relief, and in spite of our vaunted prosperity the number still was 817,000. Then one in three of the population over 65 was in receipt of Poor Law relief. These were matters which in prosperous times should receive more attention from the Government. Arable land was going out of cultivation, and large numbers of the rural population were driven to the towns to obtain a living, swelling the competition in the labour market there. He believed that a registration fee upon grain coming into this country would be exceedingly popular and would tend to increase the employment of the rural population. These were not views which he reserved for the House of Commons. They were views which he freely held and had conferred with his constituents upon. His constituents were an absolutely working class and industrial community, and they saw most clearly that the present condition of affairs was full of evil, if not of great danger for the future, as regarded the poorer and the working class population. He earnestly hoped that in his next Budget the Chancellor of the Exchequer would endeavour to do something to remedy this condition of affairs. Lord Rosebery himself had called serious attention to the decline of British trade and the increase of foreign rivals. The revenue raised by Customs Duties was scarcely less than 50 years ago. But the revenue raised was entirely paid by the consumer, because none of the articles upon which it was raised could possibly be produced in this country, and he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider whether the transfer of these duties to articles competing with our own trade and labour, instead of articles which do not compete with it, and upon which duties have to be paid entirely by the consumer, would not be more advantageous to the country at large.

Mr. W. ALLAN (Gateshead) regretted to hear the speech just delivered. He should have thought the recent dictum of the First Lord of the Treasury against Protection would have satisfied him, and that he would no longer have trotted out that bogey. He failed to find anything practical in the speeches either of the right hon. Member for Thanet or the hon. Member who had just spoken. The former talked about the material produced in other countries out-cutting British merchants and manufacturers, and he pictured the absolute ruin of British manufacturers. What were the facts of the case? Take the jute trade. It was thought at one time that by erecting mills in India, where jute was grown, manufacturers could outsell the British market, and especially the Dundee market. Dundee was peculiarly the centre of the jute trade; it was called "Juteopolis." [A laugh.] Certain capitalists went to India and built jute mills. They employed native labour, and ran their employés night and day, and worked them hours which would not be tolerated in any civilised country, to make dividends. Had they outcut Dundee? The manufacture of jute yielded as much profit as ever in Dundee. It could be manufactured cheaper in Dundee than in India, and wages were better in Dundee than ever. Whereas formerly jute operatives got £1 a week, they were now getting 34s. Then take shipbuilding. We licked the German shipbuilders into fits. [Laughter.] While our youths were learning their trade the young Germans were conscripts, serving their time in the army, and the result was our workmen could knock in two rivets to their one. What, then, was the use of talking about our trade going to the dogs? Take Norway and Sweden. We paid higher wages than were paid in those countries, and worked shorter hours, and their workmen could not touch ours. Then there was the iron and steel trade. Belgium was often held up as running this country very hard. He admitted that it was in some things. But as to rails, girders, and beams, we could undersell them and beat them on their own ground, although our workmen worked shorter hours and received better wages. Take coal-mining in the Rhine Valley. Why did we send hundreds and thousands of tons of coal to Germany if they could produce the coal cheaper? They could not do it, and, although our pitmen got higher wages, we could beat Germany in shipments of coal. Our pitmen could get two tons out of the ground while they were getting one. He pointed out that the cry of "Made in Germany" was likely to inflict injury on English manufacturers and workmen. As an instance of this he mentioned the case of an English engineering firm which had practically secured a repeat order for engines to be erected in a German manufactory, when the workmen told the employers they would strike if they made any more English machinery for Germany. If this cry were to be persisted in they would have other countries retaliating with the phrase, "Made in England," and decline to receive goods manufactured in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] In the genuine British stuffs for which this country was famous, such as cloths, engines, ships, machinery and large manufactures, no other nation could touch us. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member wanted to tax grain, but that was a thing which the working classes would never stand, while it ought to be the duty of every Government to give the necessaries of life at the lowest possible cost to the nation. Even if grain were taxed wages would not rise as a consequence, because during the time of the heavy tax on grain workmen received less wages than they did now. He protested against the trotting out of this played-out bogey of protection, which was dead and buried, and which would never be resurrected again while the British people had common sense. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.) observed in the intensely interesting statement of his right hon. Friend there was one subject to which he made no reference, and to which he believed the country was expecting him to allude. He meant the rate of interest on Post Office Savings Bank deposits. On the 26th February his right hon. Friend stated that he had the matter under consideration, because it was clear the present regulations could not continue. He did not consider the matter immediately urgent, as it was only this year that a deficit had been shown on the account, and that was only small. But in the Trustee Savings Banks, as the House knew, there had been a deficit, which increased each year, for many years. His object, however, in raising the subject was because he desired, as he thought his right hon. Friend did, to do nothing which would discourage national thrift, nor which would divert the savings of the artisan classes to less sound investments, and because he was convinced the sooner the subject was taken in hand the less drastic would be the changes which his right hon. Friend would find it necessary to make. For example, at the present moment, out of 6,453,000 accounts opened at the Post Office Savings Banks there were only 248,943 above £100, and the deposits of these accounts amounted to £38,500,000 out of the £112,000,000 which was the present total of the Post Office Savings Bank Deposits. One half per cent. reduction on accounts of over £100 would give nearly £200,000, which was so much above the probable loss for a long time to come, that for the present, at any rate, if the matter were taken in hand at once, it would probably suffice to reduce the rate of interest only on accounts of over £150. What they all wanted was to protect the small depositors. It was for these the Post Office Savings Banks were primarily designed, and it was in their interest that he hoped his right hon. Friend would take the matter soon in hand. There was no question of "charity," to use the term of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 26th February. A small alteration, if enacted soon, would give the Exchequer all that was needed, and would protect the taxpayer from loss which, of course, he should not be called on to bear on account of the Savings Banks.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) desired, on the other hand, to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for not having listened to the advice of the hon. Member who had just spoken, to reduce the interest on Post Office Savings Bank deposits. He earnestly hoped the right hon. Gentleman would persist in this refusal, and continue to pay the same rate of interest on these small deposits, giving the depositor the excellent security of the Government. The Banks, it seemed, were not satisfied with making the huge profits they now made, but wanted also to deprive the poor people of the advantage they had got in these excellent institutions of the Government. He fully approved of the announcement which the right hon. Gentleman had been able to make with regard to the improvements in the Post Office service, which would bring that institution into harmony with rival institutions abroad. He hoped that careful consideration would be given to the labour questions which would arise in carrying out the improvements. Turning to the Budget itself, he was greatly disappointed in it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that the finances of the country had reached the largest amount they had ever reached. New taxes which were imposed two or three years ago were only just coming into full bearing now. In addition, they had great and splendid trade, producing the flourishing condition of the revenue, and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer managed to fritter away all these splendid resources without giving any advantage in the Budget to any class in the community. He repudiated the remark of the right hon. Gentleman that of all the spending departments in this country the most expensive was the House of Commons. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made that remark about the extravagance of the House of Commons (for which there was no foundation) he knew the right hon. Gentleman was going to suggest some extravagance of his own, and he did. He told them the First Lord of the Admiralty had threatened them with a further increase of the Navy Estimates, and had said that if a certain other Power built war ships the Government would have to take notice of it. Was that the extravagance of the House of Commons? Certainly not. It was the greed of the Departments which sat beside the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had already provided 22½ millions for the Navy, and why, therefore, provide another £500,000 out of the £1,250,000 of the surplus which he had left? He deprecated such a frittering away of the surplus. He was glad to hear the remarks of the right hon. Member for Bodmin with regard to this Naval matter. He would like to point out that a great responsibility rested upon the House, because they had the strongest Navy in the world, and if they chose to pause in the building of war ships then other countries would do the same. It was the one that was the strongest that ought to stop first. They started on one of those foolish shipbuilding programmes ten years ago. Since then they had spent nearly £50,000,000, and they had scarcely improved their relative position. The effect of their naval programme was to stimulate other countries to go on, and the farther they went the farther would other countries go. They had had this year the heaviest Army Estimates and the heaviest Navy Estimates. They had had an Army Loan Bill, and they were going to have a Navy Loan Bill, and then this little half-million, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have spent in so many useful ways, he chucked to these "dogs of war," to which so many other millions had gone. He would only refer to the expenditure of £200,000 on the South African expedition to say that he thanked the Leader of the House for the excellent language in which he referred to it. Nothing could be more desirable, and he hoped the Government would stand firm in its determination. The broad case he had against the Budget was that, while they had the largest resources that this country had ever shown, no reduction whatever had been made in the taxes. He was afraid the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was a little to blame for the extravagance of the present Government. He blamed himself for praising the Budget of 1894 in too enthusiastic a manner. It was only the principle of that Budget that he was entirely in favour of, and not the way in which the money raised by that excellent principle had been frittered away. He regretted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not reduced taxation. He believed a great many people had begun to think this had gone a great deal too far, and that, in a time of perfect peace, and when the natural increase of expenditure was so great, they might afford to dispense with some of the taxation put on in 1894. He believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer had again wilfully under-estimated the revenue in order that there might be a surplus next year, and in order to avoid the necessity of taking off any taxes. They ought to have a more careful estimate than they had, and he should be glad to see a change made in this respect. The most interesting part of the Chancellor's speech was the comparison he made with 60 years ago. He there treated the finances of the United Kingdom as a whole, but, personally, he thought it was time that, in the national treatment of finance, they had some reference made regularly to Ireland, because everything in their national finances which was going in one direction in Great Britain was going in the opposite direction so far as Ireland was concerned. The Chancellor pointed out that in 1837 the total revenue of the country was £52,000,000, and that now it was about £102,000,000. The population had also doubled, and wealth had far more than doubled, so that the burden of this greater taxation fell with infinitely less weight than it did 60 years ago. But look at the Irish figures. In 1837 the Irish taxation was about £4,000,000. It was now £8,000,000, though the population had sunk to one-half and wealth had diminished in proportion to the diminution of the population. So that in Ireland to-day they were really collecting the taxes that they ought to collect if there was a population of 15 or 16 millions in the country. He asked the House to notice this extraordinary contrast between the two countries—a contrast which, in his opinion, made the greatest tragedy which existed in any civilised country. That was a tragedy for which that House alone was responsible, and it cast the darkest shadow which would be cast on this splendid reign. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also said that in 1837 indirect taxation was 71 per cent., and to-day it was only 44 per cent. It was scarcely candid of the right hon. Gentleman to make that statement. In Ireland to-day the indirect taxation was 75 per cent. They were worse off to-day than they were in 1837. The right hon. Gentleman said that there was a great deal of smuggling in 1837. Wherever they found smuggling, it was the desperate effort of people who could not pay the taxes to get hold of commodities without paying taxes. [Cries of "No!"] The right hon. Gentleman said this smuggling had practically disappeared. As regarded Great Britain, yes; but if he had looked into the Inland Revenue returns for last year he would have seen that cases of smuggling in Ireland had increased in the last year to 1,388 from 1,107. The right hon. Gentleman then said they had taken the taxes off thousands of articles. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: "Hundreds!"] Well, hundreds; and taxed alcohol, tea, and tobacco. They had, and that was how they had ruined and plundered the Irish. ["Oh!"] He would make good his point, but if he had used an offensive expression he would at once withdraw it. The relief given by taking off the taxes did not extend in anything like the same proportion to Ireland as to England. There were a great many articles taxed, not exactly in 1837, but 10 or 15 years previously, and that was just the same because the present system of finance commenced in 1817. There were a great many articles including necessaries of life, such as soap, bricks, and glass, taxed. The total tax on those articles about 1821 was 23s. 7d. per head of the population of Great Britain; it was 2s. 6d. in Ireland. To-day there was only 7d. collected in Great Britain and 4d. in Ireland. Ten times more relief had been given in Great Britain than in Ireland. It was by such means that the burden had been shifted on to the shoulders of Ireland. The whole of the Irish tragedy had been created in this reign. In 1837 the taxation per head of the population in Ireland was 13s. 6d., in 1897 it was 53s. The taxation had been doubled and quadrupled in Ireland while it had been reduced in Great Britain. Let him give figures to show how Ireland had been hardly dealt with. The taxation to-day on all forms of alcohol per head of the population in England was 16s. 8d., in Scotland 21s. 1d., and in Ireland 14s. 11d. If beer, whisky and wine were taxed at the same rate as in 1829, the tax would be, in England 26s. 6d., in Scotland 14s. 11d., and in Ireland 10s. 2d. The change then that had been made since 1829 had taken 9s. 10d. per head off the Englishman's drink, and had added 6s. 2d. per head to the Scotchman's drink, and 4s. 9d. per head to the Irishman's drink. To put it in another way, suppose that the spirit in drinks were taxed as the spirit in whisky was taxed, then England would pay £2 2s. per head, Scotland £1 8s. 10d., and Ireland £1 6s. 3d. To put it in a third way, suppose that the spirit in all alcoholic drinks were taxed as the spirit in beer was taxed, England would pay 9s. per head, Scotland 6s. 2d., and Ireland 6s. 7d. He desired to point the moral. England had managed the finances, and what had she done? She had cheapened her own drink and increased the tax on the Scotchman's and Irishman's drink. The taxation was not based on any intelligible principle. The principle England had adopted was to cheapen the stuff Englishmen like, and to put an increased tax on the stuff the other fellows like. By any honest principle the Englishman would have paid most, because he drank most. The English consumption of alcohol in the year was equal to 4 gallons of proof spirit; the Scotch to 2¾ gallons, and the Irish to 2½ gallons. Why this arrangement had borne so hardly on Ireland was, that the taxation had been constantly raised. He would admit that the tax was raised by the late Government and not by the present. [Ironical cheers.] It was indeed quite tragic that the Government which came in to do justice to Ireland had left in Ireland as the sole permanent monument of its existence four new taxes. The Inquiry which the Government had promised was delusive, because the injustice was still going on. Since the last Commission was appointed in 1894 the taxation in Ireland had been raised by £600,000. In the last financial year eight millions were collected from Ireland—a larger amount than had been ever collected before in one year. There would be great disappointment in Ireland that the right hon. Gentleman had made no reference to the case of Ireland, for the Debate on the Financial Relations was regarded as quite unsatisfactory. He would like the right hon. Gentleman to explain one phrase in his speech. The right hon. Gentleman said that the questions raised with reference to the financial relations might have to be dealt with, and they were very large matters. That was a much more sympathetic utterance than anything in the right hon. Gentleman's previous speech, and he hoped that it meant something.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I said after a full inquiry, which will, of course, be conducted by the Commission we are going to appoint.

Mr. LOUGH hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not shut his mind to the very grave questions raised. If a common system were applied to two countries so different as Ireland and England, a great injustice must be done to one country. He did not wish to disturb the excellent fiscal system in Great Britain; but he did desire separate treatment for Ireland. It was said that that would involve the re-establishment of the Irish Customs House, abolished in 1847. But that would only be a nominal Customs House. He did not desire to interfere with the principle of free trade; but such a Customs House was necessary to adjusting the financial grievances, because by that means only could the true state of Irish trade be discovered. At present the Irish trade Returns were mixed up with the English. If the true facts were known, such a pathetic state of poverty would be revealed that the House would no longer hesitate to do full justice to Ireland. He did not ask that Great Britain should in any way pay for Ireland, but only that Ireland should not be taxed remorselessly, as she was in the present Budget, and regardless of the fact that her wealth and population had disappeared. Direct taxation required no Custom House, and the Government could abolish the income tax in Ireland. [Ironical laughter.] The details which were given in the Inland Revenue Return as to the collection of income tax afforded striking evidence as to the truth of the proposition that it was a most unsuitable tax to Ireland. In Great Britain the bulk of the income tax was levied on trade, and here it was more suitable for trade than Irish land. It was a British tax, and it was a great mistake ever to have extended it to Ireland. It was also a great pity that the Irish case had not received some attention from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, though there had been a rumour that the right hon. Gentleman was going to apply the Agricultural Rating Act to Ireland. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had taken no step in that direction, and he thought that the financial statement as a whole would be received with considerable regret by the great mass of the people.

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester) while congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the extreme simplicity of his Budget regretted that he had not seen his way to abolish the small and anomalous tax on plate. The amount was only £55,000, and the tax fell mainly on the poor watchmakers. It was their unanimous desire to have the tax taken off, though he believed the jewellers wished it to be maintained, though this was hardly in a spirit of fair competition. The tax was imposed in 1758, and it appeared to him to be extraordinary that it had not long ago been abolished. It was now too late to make an appeal to his right hon. Friend, but he hoped the question would be considered another year. The tax had been condemned over and over again, and it had been brought to the notice of various Chancellors of the Exchequer during many years.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) said he regretted that during the greater part of his hon. Friend's speech there was not a single Member from Ireland present to express approval or assent to the propositions he had made. He wished, however, to remind the Committee, as a Scotch Member, that they in Scotland had a great grievance which must arise at a later stage of the Budget discussion, and that was as to the appropriations of the equivalent grant in connection with the English grant to education. If it was the intention of the Government to give a grant in aid to Voluntary Schools in Scotland, and to ignore and repudiate the principle of their equivalent grant, he had no hesitation in saying that the Scottish Members would be unanimous in resisting that mode of dealing with their claim. Turning to the bearing of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's financial statement on the Navy, he did not accept the account which his hon. Friend the Member for West Islington had given of the history of the naval proposals in the House this Session. He did not admit that the demand made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one that was being forced on the House by the Admiralty or the Government. They had strong grounds for saying that the proposition was being forced on the Government and the Admiralty by the prevailing sentiment of the House of Commons. He repudiated the notion that the demand for this extra half million for the naval service was a demand which had been thrust upon the House of Commons by the Admiralty. He believed the opposite to be much nearer the truth. When the First Lord of the Admiralty submitted his naval Estimates to the House one most important fact was not made apparent, but was brought out by the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean and himself. The casual observer would have imagined that there was no diminution in the Estimates in the provision for new construction, and yet, as a matter of fact, there had been an enormous reduction in the cash provision for new construction. It so happened that the naval plans of the Government for the present year were first published in extraordinarily minute detail in a newspaper early in the Session. The only respect in which the newspaper was wrong was in regard to new construction, and everybody came to the conclusion that after the information was supplied to the newspaper there must have been some change in the plans of the Government respecting new construction. When he examined the Estimates he came to the conclusion that instead of keeping up new construction to the standard already existing the Government had reduced the cash provision for that purpose by a very large sum, approaching a million. That night they had before them a proposal which had surprised many Members. The deficiency was being made good, and £500,000 was to be devoted to new construction. He raised no objection to that, but he thought it right to draw attention to the fact that there was a deficiency at the beginning of the Session, which deficiency was now being supplied. The First Lord of the Admiralty, when the Estimates were under consideration, had uttered a kind of obiter dictum to the effect that the Government held themselves free to propose new construction if there should be any great development of new programmes in other countries. Now the Chancellor of the Exchequer had explained that the £500,000 for new construction was required because other nations were pushing forward their naval programmes. This declaration cast upon the First Lord of the Admiralty the obligation of showing that since the Navy Estimates were presented there had been a development abroad not of paper, but of real naval programmes. There was another point which called for remark. Two months ago they were given to understand that there was to be a new Naval Works Loans Bill this year, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that evening that the Admiralty had not spent nearly all the money to which it was entitled under the second Naval Works Act, which gave to the Admiralty, without limit of time, the power of spending 2½ millions upon naval works. During the past year the Admiralty, he understood, had only spent some £830,000 of this money, so there must be an unexpended balance of 1¾ million. How then came it to be necessary to have a new Naval Works Loan Bill this year? The Opposition, even if they did not object to that Bill or to the Military Works Loans Bill, were entitled to point out that the country would not have been driven to borrow money for urgent military and naval purposes if the Government had not squandered so much of their surplus in aiding special classes of the community. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] If he had spoken earlier in the evening, he would have been tempted to allude to what he might call the inflamed discussion which took place some hours ago as to the policy of the Government in South Africa. He had, however, heard with the greatest satisfaction that a speech had been made by the Leader of the House which put an entirely new aspect on the subject, and which made it incumbent upon him to keep silence on the subject until it could be brought up in a formal way. He would only say that he was alarmed by the terms in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced this additional military expenditure in South Africa, because the right hon. Gentleman appeared to connect it with the enforcement of what he called our treaty rights. He could not help connecting that statement with the deplorable letter from the Colonial Secretary, dated March 6, which appeared in the last Blue-book, and in which one of the alleged breaches of the Convention was referred to. He would ask the Committee to allow him to read a single sentence from that letter:—

> "2. The Accession of the South African Republic to the Geneva Convention.—After Dr. Jameson's raid, owing to a report made by the St. John's Ambulance Association, Her Majesty's Government determined to invite the South African Republic to accede to the Geneva Convention, and the necessary instructions were sent to Sir J. de Wet, who, however, omitted to carry them out. The South African Republic on September 30th formally communicated to the Swiss Government, through their representative at the Hague, their act of accession to the Geneva Convention. Her Majesty's Government, in the circumstances, did not hesitate to convey the Queen's approval, but the action of the Government of the Republic none the less constituted a breach of the London Convention."

[Ministerial cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheered that. As a matter of law and common sense he challenged them to deny, first of all, that the approval of Her Majesty ratified any previous irregularities; and, secondly, that in this particular case the act they objected to as a breach of the Convention—

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS pointed out that the hon. Member was now going into details relating to a Blue-book the consideration of which, by the common consent of the Committee, had been deferred to a later day. Of course, he had no power to prevent the hon. Member from going into the matter.

Sir W. HARCOURT said he had never heard of any such common consent of the Committee. There was a demand in this Budget for £200,000 for increasing the military armaments at the Cape, and unless that demand was withdrawn from the Budget the Committee could not be prevented from discussing it. [Cheers.]

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said he had stated that, as a point of order, he could not stop the hon. Member from going into the matter; but, now that he was challenged on the matter he was bound to say that it was irrelevant at the present stage to go into the minute details of a Blue-book, and, therefore, he must request the hon. Member to desist from going into them. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. E. ROBERTSON said that any request from the Chair would always meet with his approval. All he had to say about the matter was that he hoped that it was not one of the reasons that had led to this increased military expenditure that the Transvaal Republic had done what Her Majesty's Government had asked them to do. Such a position was too ridiculous to be taken up. [Cheers.] In conclusion he would only say that he had listened with the greatest admiration to the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could hardly find language adequate to express his admiration of both the statements the right hon. Gentleman had made. He could only hope that influences such as his might prevail in the Party of which, at the present time, he was the chief ornament. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) said that the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down said he should not enter into any discussion of the incident which had previously taken place, and they watched him proceeding. They arrived at the conclusion that he was not a bad disciple of the Member for Monmouthshire. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government had no wish to shrink from the discussion, but he should not be surprised if many Members opposite repudiated the action of their Leaders. [Opposition cries of "No!"] The hon. Member said he should only read a single extract from the Dispatch. It was unfair to pick out one extract from one Dispatch and say it was a casus belli. A more outrageous proceeding he had never heard. [Cheers.] Perhaps it was a mere rhetorical flight of the hon. Member; he called it a deplorable matter, and then he did not enter into a general discussion. He was glad of the intervention of the Member for Monmouthshire, as it would give him an opportunity of saying a few words which he otherwise would not have been able to say. With regard to the naval question, he had told the hon. Member before—and he would ask him to do him the honour of accepting his statement as true—that there was no change whatever in the programme initiated by Her Majesty's Government even before the commencement of this year. Against that the hon. Member quoted a statement in a newspaper, forgetting that when he was in office there was purloined information. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member suggested that there was some change of front in regard to their Estimates, and in support of this he quoted the statement in the newspaper. For that statement there was not a single atom of foundation. There had been no change whatever in their programme. The Chancellor of the Exchequer granted the money asked for by the Admiralty. They had their programme completed long before. The next point was that their new construction had been diminished by a million; but this was a mistake, and the hon. Member had been misled by the intricacies which prevailed in all naval Estimates. As to the hon. Member's statement that the £500,000 was grantd in consequence of some obiter dictum of his in reply to an hon. Member as to the abnormal efforts in other directions, it was notorious that naval expenditure had been increased not by paper programmes. If the hon. Member challenged him it might be necessary to explain; but he trusted that he would not take that particular course. He should be sorry to have to enumerate the grounds on which Her Majesty's Government had felt it to be their duty to ask for this increase. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped the hon. Member would not press for this precise information; but he could assure the Committee it had not been an afterthought that this £500,000 had been asked for. He had examined the comparative expenditure of European countries, and it was on that examination that they had made this additional Estimate. Then there was a reference as to the Naval Works Bill; but the sum mentioned did not represent what was expended in any particular year. They had not spent all that they expected to spend, and that money would be available this year. It was distinctly stated last year that there would be a sum for new works. There was in contemplation new work and additional expenditure on Dover Harbour, and for that purpose a new Bill was required. It would be introduced before long; but the surveys had taken some time to complete, and the Admiralty were anxious not to come before the House asking for money until they were able to submit definite figures on the subject. ["Hear, hear!"]

SIR SAMUEL MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel) said the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought forward in his able speech reasonable proposals, but of no great magnitude. He wished the right hon. Gentleman in his able Budget speech had included one dealing with the Stamps on Bonds, and shares to bearer and on Bills of Exchange. On a former occasion he brought his views before the House and to the notice of Sir Alfred Milner, who did not differ with them. He trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would in the near future equalise those duties and modify them. By so doing he would increase the revenue and facilitate trade. Bonds were treated very unequally as regards stamps. Some were charged with 10s. per £100, others, including Colonial, 2s. 6d. per £100, while an immense quantity were entirely free from Stamp Duty. The 10s. duty on Bonds issued in this country and on certain Bonds delivered here was too high. It led to evasion, or to the diversion of trade to rival countries. In either case the Exchequer suffered. If evidence of evasion or legal avoidance of this duty was required, the India Office could supply it. Many millions of Bonds issued by the Indian Government were free of Stamp Duty. Others indirectly issued by them with their direct guarantee paid 2s. 6d. and 10s. per £100. There were in existence about £13,000,000 of this class of security on which the high duty of 10s. had been paid. In order to avoid the charge for Stamps on a fresh issue, the Bonds falling due were renewed whenever possible. If the rate of interest was changed the old Bond was still retained, and fresh coupon sheets were attached. This system would continue so long as this high duty was imposed, or until the Bond was worn out. If the duty were reduced to 5s. it might suit the companies to pay off the old Bonds with available funds, and issue later on fresh Bonds when the Money Market was favourable. On the other hand, an enormous quantity of foreign Bonds and Shares to bearer paid no duty whatever when delivered in this country. Such Bonds or Shares to bearer issued, and the dividends payable outside the United Kingdom, required no stamp; whereas the identical securities if issued here, or the dividends made payable here, must bear 10s. per £100 Stamp Duty. He saw no reason why a moderate Stamp Duty should not be universally imposed. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, tried to obtain a revenue from these securities, but in a most vexatious manner. An adhesive stamp of 1s. per £100 had to be affixed to these Bonds and Shares annually whenever transferred or the inconvenience might be avoided by the payment of 10s. per £100 once for all. Very few could avail themselves of this option, and the troublesome tax was removed by the present Leader of the Opposition substituting an increased stamp on contracts. He was convinced that by such a uniform charge of 5s., the revenue would be increased, and our traders would not be handicapped to the advantage of foreigners. This conviction was supported by the opinions of permanent officials at Somerset House, and by Sir Algernon West and Sir Alfred Milner. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would consent to appoint a Select Committee to consider the Stamp Duties. That Committee would make clear the effect on trade of the Stamp Duty on Bills of Exchange drawn out of the United Kingdom and payable out of the United Kingdom, but negotiated here. The transactions in foreign Bills had declined enormously of late years. He knew from his own experience that they were not a quarter of what they were 40 years ago. In 1895 the return from Bill Stamps was £626,000, and in 1896 it was £672,000. But in 1885 the return was £683,000, and in 1886 £637,000. These Bills of Exchange were international instruments of credit, and it would be of great value to the mercantile community if all countries were to have similar regulations in regard to them. As to the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks, he urged that the interest on deposits of over £100 should be reduced from 2½ per cent. to 2 per cent. That would not affect the great mass of working-class depositors, and thrift was promoted more by the security than the rate of interest given. This high rate of interest, by attracting money to the savings banks, was detrimental to commercial interests; it involved loss to the Government and forced up the price of Consols to the disadvantage of the operations of the Sinking Fund. The saving effected by reducing the interest on the larger deposits would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to hold a large reserve of gold when gold might be difficult to obtain. A golden opportunity of creating this reserve was lost last year; but gold was still plentiful and could be gradually amassed by the Government.

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said the problem of the Post Office Savings Banks must be solved before very long, for two reasons—first that we were drifting into a very large deficit on the part of the savings banks, and also that we were driving up the price of Consols to a point that would make it difficult to supply them. The idea that in past years the Post Office Savings Bank had been worked at a profit was well founded. When Consols were £92 or £93, as they were some years ago, there was no doubt that a considerable profit was made on the sums invested. The simple solution of the problem was that the present system should be stopped at once—that existing depositors should go on as they were, but that all fresh depositors should be paid a lower rate. He should be sorry if any step were taken that would appear to be discouraging thrift; but the reduction in the rate of interest would mean only a loss of about a farthing a week to the average investor. Another objection to the present system was that if the State invested the Post Office money in Colonial or Corporation Stock it amounted to the State guaranteeing that Stock, the result of which would be that the price of the Stock would go up at once. The savings banks deposits were increasing at the rate of one million a month, and we were paying off the National Debt at the rate of three-quarters of a million a month, and at the rate we were going, Consols would, in a few years, be practically unpurchaseable.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) said some things had been done recently by the Transvaal Government which he could not palliate or approve of—things which ought not to be done by any modern civilised State, and which largely diminished the sympathy that some of them felt with President Kruger. One of those acts was the suppression of newspapers. ["Hear, hear!"] That was a policy which carried them back to the dark days, ten years ago, when the Conservative Party was coercing Ireland. [Cheers and laughter.] If the Irish people had the power then he felt sure they should have spent at least £200,000 in preventing by force of arms the suppression of their newspapers, and he could only commend the generous spirit of the English people in preventing a similar invasion of the liberties of English-speaking people in other parts of the world. With regard to the question of the savings banks, he would like to know how they had managed to pay 2½ per cent. on the deposits without actually incurring any loss? They did it by sweating Ireland. [Ministerial laughter.] In respect of the Irish Church Fund, they had refused year by year to reduce the rate of interest, and it was by means of the exaggerated amount of interest which for 20 years they had been receiving from an Irish charitable fund that they had made their account balance. English Chancellors of the Exchequer had for many years shown themselves adept in making their accounts balance, and making up a deficit by putting their hand into somebody else's pocket. He was bound to say there was no indication in the Budget statement of this year that there was to be any change in the policy which had been consistently pursued towards Ireland. As to the retrospect in which the right hon. Gentleman had indulged, he did not begrudge the English people the enormous advances in their material and social prosperity which they had made during the present year, but he would ask them not to forget that during this reign Ireland had certainly declined in population, and, according to the Report of the Financial Commission, in wealth also. They in Ireland had no reason to look back with any satisfaction on the retrospect that had been suggested by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There had been no more miserable period in the history of their country. They had had a famine, and, in addition, they had suffered from a slow process by which the life-blood of the people had been drained, which was worse than a famine. A great part of their sufferings during this period they owed to the policy of Her Majesty's advisers, supported by the majority of the English people. So far as England was concerned, he believed it was true that the working classes now contributed very little taxation, but it was not the case in Ireland. At the present moment 75 per cent. of the taxation raised in Ireland was raised by indirect taxation, which was largely contributed by the working classes of the country. They talked about the prosperity of Belfast. But even there there were a large number of families in which the father, apart from the labour of the women and children, could not earn anything like 13s. a week. He would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider a few figures. It was not too much to suppose that such a family would consume 1lb. of tea per week. On that they would pay to the revenue 17s. 4d. a year, and more was exacted from the consumer than was actually received by the State, because various middlemen must have their profit on the amount of the duty as well as the cost of the original article. On an ounce of tobacco a week the family would pay 8s. 8d. a year. A glass of whisky every second day between five persons, not all adults, would not be a large allowance. [Laughter.] He would not call a man a drunkard who had a glass of whisky every second day with the help of his family. [Renewed laughter.] The sum payable in a year for a glass of whisky on that basis would be £1 10s. 5d., and the Irish peasant would pay considerably more in duty on articles of indirect taxation than the typical poor English family at the beginning of the reign, visions of whom the Chancellor of the Exchequer had conjured up. If it was the pride of their policy that they had relieved the sufferings of their own poor by lessening the burden of taxation upon them, why was it not their duty to relieve the burdens which still pressed on the poor in the sister isle. He might be told that the articles of indirect taxation which he had mentioned would not have been consumed by the English poor at the beginning of the Queen's reign. Who compelled them to eat bread? A large portion of Irish people preferred potatoes. A large portion of the world's population got on very well without bread, so it could not be said that bread was a necessary of life, and the articles consumed by the English poor at the beginning of the century were not essentials of life. The Irish people were not compelled to use tea and tobacco, but they were necessary in a climate like that of Ireland. Though taxation in Ireland might be levied on a few articles, the Irish people paid more in proportion to their income than the English poor did on the thousand articles which were taxed at the beginning of the Queen's reign. In the case of income tax, still more of the Death Duties, there was a certain amount of graduation. The rich man had to pay more in proportion to his income to a certain extent than the poor man, but in the case of commodities it was the opposite way. It was considered according to the free trade system that specific duties should be levied and not ad valorem, and consequently, in the case of tea, they took fourpence whether the tea be worth in bond tenpence a pound or two shillings. He had never been able to understand precisely why that should be a necessary part of the free trade system. He saw in the United States that the Democrats, who were regarded as the more free trade of the two parties, had substituted ad valorem for specific duties in the Wilson as compared with the McKinley Bill, because they said ad valorem duties were fairer as between rich and poor. He saw that the Liberal Party in Canada, as one of the features of that magnificent Budget they had introduced—and it was the wish of all Members that they might be able to carry it through—were going to substitute ad valorem for specific duties. Therefore, he was bound to say, from the Cobden point of view, there was ground for reconsidering that anathema which was pronounced in the middle years of the century against ad valorem duties. It might be true that this system of raising their money by specific duties on commodities was a system which pressed less heavily on the vast trade of this great commercial country, but it was also true that that system pressed most heavily upon the poor of this country, and still more upon the poor of Ireland. If they considered it necessary for the maintenance of their commercial supremacy that they should keep up this free trade system, under which they had undoubtedly prospered, and if they considered as part of that free trade system they should tax the commodities of the poor, proportionately to their value, much heavier than the commodities consumed by the rich, then he said they ought to look about them to see whether, without sacrificing their free trade system, they could give to the poor some other redress. Even if Ireland were not a separate entity and the Irish people only so many individuals, taxpayers and citizens of this country, then on that basis it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, finding there were these individuals on whom this system pressed so heavily, to attempt, in his financial statement of the year, to give them some relief. The right hon. Gentleman had made no such attempt, and there was nothing in the Budget to give relief to the people of Ireland. He did not suppose that there ever would be anything in the Budget of an English Chancellor of the Exchequer which would give relief to the people of Ireland until England was afraid of losing Ireland in the course of a foreign war. He was reading some time ago a letter of the Duke of Wellington, written in 1808, when he was engaged in military operations in the North of Portugal. In that letter the Duke wrote strongly to the English Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, urging him, for political reasons, not to follow the advice of those who asked him to increase the taxation of Ireland. It was undesirable, in the opinion of the Duke, to increase the taxation of Ireland during the circumstances of those years. England was then in the throes of a death struggle with France, and it would have been dangerous to increase the taxation of Ireland to the pitch to which it had been raised now. But at the present day, England was not afraid that there was anybody on the whole face of the world who was likely to stir a finger to help Ireland. For this reason England continued to sweat and over-tax the Irish people, who were the poorest of the inhabitants of the United Kingdom.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member who has just sat down and the hon. Member for Islington must excuse me if I do not on this occasion enter at length into the important question of the financial relations between Ireland and Great Britain. We have had a Debate on that already, and, no doubt, we shall have some further Debates on the subject. I will only venture to say with regard to the charge they have made against me of not considering the circumstances of Ireland in the comparison I made, that I did consider the circumstances of Ireland, and I stated that the advance of prosperity of which I spoke had not come to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects alike. But I entirely deny that it has come to no one in Ireland. There is a corner in Ireland—the north-east corner, Belfast, and its neighbourhood—which, in my belief, has prospered as much as any part of Great Britain. ["Hear, hear!"] If I am asked why the rest of Ireland has not been equally prosperous, I am afraid the only answer can be that we have not all prospered equally, the agricultural districts of the country have prospered least, and Ireland is mainly an agricultural country. My comparison of the taxation on a labourer's family in 1836 and last year applied equally to Ireland as to Great Britain, because the commodities were those on which the rates of taxation were equal in 1836 in Ireland and in Great Britain.

Mr. LOUGH: Not spirits.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I carefully excluded spirits from my comparison just as I did beer, and the articles I took were not concerned with alcohol of any kind. The comparison was perfectly fair with regard to the relief of taxation which has been received under the change in our fiscal system by the Irish labourer just as much as by the Scotch or English labourer. Some hon.Members have raised several questions in the course of the evening on which I would only say a very few words. My hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester and my hon. Friend the Member for East Finsbury asked me if I would consider the abolition of the plate licence duty. I have had a great many representations on that subject, both for and against the abolition of the duty. As far as I can make out, it is one of those rare taxes which those who pay it desire to maintain. [Laughter.] That being so, I confess I am rather predisposed against its abolition, particularly as the Exchequer would not lose, but the County Councils, who now receive its proceeds. I happen to know that the County Councils' Association are particularly desirous to retain it, unless I am willing to give them an equivalent grant in place of the tax. On the whole, I do not think there is a good case for the abolition of the plate licence duty. My hon. Friend the Member for East Islington and the hon. Baronet the Member for Whitechapel, have referred to the interest on deposits in Savings Banks. I have already stated in the course of this Session that that subject is under my very careful consideration. I am bound to say that the more I look at it the more I feel what very great difficulties are involved in it, and, as I said when I last addressed the House on the subject, I do not think any one of us would desire to reduce the rate of interest upon deposits in savings banks unless we were absolutely convinced that it was essential to the public interest to do so. ["Hear, hear!"] The matter is before me, and when I have any announcement to make in regard to it, it will, of course, take the shape of the introduction of a Bill. I am afraid I have introduced an element of controversy into the Debate this evening by the statement I made that I had to reserve £200,000 in my Budget for increasing the Imperial garrison in South Africa. I think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth, whom I have to thank for the kind way in which he referred to me, rather complained that I had mentioned the matter at all. I do not know what else I could have done. Last year, I remember, I was attacked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton for not having made any provision in my Budget for military expenses in the Soudan. At that time I had no reason to expect we should be called upon to pay anything; but this evening I knew that we were about to incur an expenditure of £200,000, which was not provided for in the Estimates, in South Africa, and which I should have to provide for in the course of the year. I should not have been frank with the Committee if I had kept that fact back from them and if I had not stated it in the course of my Budget speech. I merely refer to the matter now, not in order to discuss it at all, because I understand that a very early opportunity will be given for a full discussion of the subject, but because I really wish to defend myself for having brought the matter before the House in the Budget speech. I trust the Committee will be willing to take one of the Resolutions to-night. I understand there is a desire on the part of the right hon. Gentleman opposite that the Tea Duty Resolution, which is usually put first, should be withdrawn to-night and the Income Tax substituted for it. I hope the Committee will be willing to take the Income Tax Resolution, and then we can report Progress. ["Hear, hear!"]

Sir W. HARCOURT: I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is quite reasonable, and I am much obliged to him for having made the alteration and reserving the Resolution in reference to the Tea Duty, because I, for one, desire on that to raise a discussion on the subject of indirect taxation. I should be glad to know from the right hon. Gentleman, or from the Leader of the House, what form the discussion he has indicated in reference to South Africa will take. Will it be on a Resolution or an Estimate, or in what particular way will that discussion be taken?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I presume the proper way of taking the discussion will be upon a supplementary Estimate, which will be moved by the Under Secretary for War. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that it cannot be put down to-morrow, and it cannot be put down for to-morrow fortnight, because that day is mortgaged to the Irish Members. Therefore we are shut in between to-morrow week and Friday, May 21. Of course, I will take whichever of these Fridays the right hon. Gentleman desires. If he takes Friday week then the discussion on foreign affairs cannot be taken on that day.

Chancellor of the Exchequer.

TEA.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Duty of Customs now payable on Tea shall continue to be charged, levied, and paid on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say):—Tea . . . the pound . Four Pence."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INCOME TAX.

Resolved, that Income Tax shall be charged for the year beginning on the sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, at the rate of eightpence.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow; Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL.

Read the Third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN AND OTHER POLICE COURTS BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

Considered in Committee.

Mr. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said he had been in communication with the Admiralty with regard to an Amendment of which he had given notice, and, having had a statement from the Secretary to the Admiralty, he did not propose to move.

Bill reported without Amendment; Read the Third time, and passed.

VOLUNTEERS BILL.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

APPEAL IN CERTAIN CIVIL MATTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On the order for the Second Reading of this Bill,

Mr. KNOX asked for an explanation of its objects.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.) said that on the introduction of the Bill he made a full statement of its purpose and effect. It simply gave an appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench to the Court of Appeal in Ireland in cases stated in four particular classes, namely, on questions of Rating under the Salmon Fisheries Acts, under the Railways Acts, and under the Civil Courts Procedure Acts.

Bill read a Second time, and committed for Monday next.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (UNDERMANNING) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

VACCINATION (ROYAL COMMISSION).

General LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether there is any reason for the delay in publishing the Appendices to the final Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination, the Report having been issued in August last; and, if a probable date can be given for the publication of the Appendices, and of the concluding volume or volumes of Minutes of Evidence?

The SECRETARY to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. Russell, Tyrone, S.): I am informed that the volumes referred to are now in the printer's hands, and will be issued as soon as the lithographs accompanying them are ready.

SOLOMON ISLANDS.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies which are the chief Solomon Islands which are the subject of the new protectorate; and in which of them the Government station is to be established?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. J. Chamberlain, Birmingham, W.): The protectorate to which the hon. Member refers was proclaimed in 1893, and extends to all the islands of the Solomon Group south of the line of demarcation fixed by the agreement with Germany in 1886. The principal islands are New Georgia, Guadalcanar, Malaita and San Christoval. The Government station is to be on the small island of Tulage, on the north side of Guadalcanar, the largest island of the group, and close to it. A Report by Mr. Woodford, the Resident, has been laid, and will shortly be in the hands of the Members.

SALT (HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS).

Sir CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the case that salt is not included among the condiments issued by the Admiralty for use on board ship; and whether, considering the importance of salt as a dietetic ingredient, and the fact that the use of salt meat as the principal form of food on board ship has long been superseded, he will consider the propriety of issuing salt as well as mustard and pepper for use on board Her Majesty's ships?

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. W. E. Macartney, Antrim, S.): Salt has hitherto been issued as a ration only in the case of boys in training ships and troops on passage, where the "savings" system does not exist. My attention was only drawn to this after the Estimates for the current year were framed, but arrangements are now being made which will meet the views expressed in the hon. Member's Question.

SCIENCE AND ART GRANTS (SCOTLAND).

Sir CHARLES CAMERON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it has been decided to transfer the administration of the grants to schools in Scotland for Science and Art to the Scotch Education Department; and, if so, when this change will be made and the details published?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): As has already been announced, it has been decided to transfer to the Scotch Education Department the administration of the Science and Art Grants to schools in Scotland. The actual transfer cannot be completed until the details which are now under consideration have been arranged.

WATERLOO AND CITY RAILWAY.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that the whole or greater part of the rolling stock required by the new Waterloo and City Railway has been ordered from America; and whether he will consider the framing of a new Standing Order directing that companies applying to Parliament to construct new railways shall be bound to purchase a fair proportion of the goods required in the United Kingdom?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C.T. RITCHIE, Croydon): No, Sir, I am not prepared to suggest such a new Standing Order. With regard to the particular case referred to, I am informed by the Company that the order has been placed with an American firm for the reason that, although no less than seven selected English firms were invited to tender, not one of them was able to complete and deliver the rolling stock in question, consisting of only 22 coaches (the wheels and axles for which are to be supplied by English and Scotch firms) within the time required by the Company for the opening of the railway.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: As I understand that the contract is not actually signed, will the right hon. Gentleman use his influence with the Company, so that they may be brought to a proper sense of their duty to English trade?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir. I do not see that any duty is imposed upon railway companies to employ people who cannot deliver goods within a specified time. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. C. E. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): Are we to understand that English labour is so fully employed that the work cannot be executed?

MR. RITCHIE: I am quite unable to state the reason why the goods cannot be delivered within the specified time, but obviously that must be the case.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Has the refusal to execute the order anything to do with the apprehension that strikes may occur?

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he will grant a Return of the cases in which, since 1870 or within the last ten or 15 years, the enlargement of a Voluntary School has not been reckoned as part of the school accommodation of a district?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I cannot give the Return asked for, which would involve a search through the correspondence of every Voluntary School. But the hon. Member may take it that the cases are very few.

POST OFFICE SERVICE.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, in view of the fact that by the Post Office Circular 1190, page 79, it is fixed that no interval between duties of less than half an hour will be booked off, but the two duties will be regarded as continuous, will he kindly ascertain whether the half hour's interval between duties is actually allowed in the Rochdale Post Office, to which the employés at that office claim to have a right if they understand the Regulation referred to correctly?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The Postmaster General will have inquiry made into this matter, as desired by the hon. Member.

"MARS" (BATTLESHIP).

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state whether the new battleship Mars has been taken over from the contractors; and whether, during her construction, there was any departure from the original specification; and, if so, will he state the amount represented by the changes?

MR. MACARTNEY: The Mars has been taken over from the contractors, and is now approaching completion, but the final payments under the contract have not yet been made, her trials being incomplete. During her construction certain additions were made to the original specification. The aggregate amount of these additions to the contract is about £11,000, on a grand total for the original contract work of £832,000.

STATIONERY (ADMIRALTY).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the heavy cost of stationery in the Admiralty Offices, he will consider the expediency of giving instructions for the printed acknowledgments of correspondence to be issued on ordinary note size paper instead of on the expensive foolscap paper at present used by the Admiralty; whether he is aware that the use of foolscap paper for such purpose has long since been superseded in other Departments by the use of paper of note size, with the result that a considerable economy in the cost of stationery has been effected; and whether, with a view to lessen the cost of the clerical staff employed at the Admiralty, he will consider the desirability of issuing type-written letters instead of letters written by hand on double-foolscap?

Mr. MACARTNEY: A Departmental Committee has been appointed to consider the whole question of the stationery used in the Admiralty Offices, and until its Report has been received I am not prepared to make any statement. The economy which would result from the adoption of the particular proposal suggested by the hon. Member would not be as considerable as he appears to imagine. It has been the practice for many years to issue type-written letters on half-sheets of foolscap, and there are at present 31 type machines in constant use in the Admiralty Departments in London.

FISHERY CRUISER "VIGILANT."

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state why the sum of £250 voted for fitting up the fishery cruiser Vigilant with a search light has not been appropriated for that purpose?

The LORD ADVOCATE: The money voted for a search light was not appropriated to that purpose because damages sustained during a gale by the deckhouse of the Vigilant, on which it had been purposed to mount it, revealed the fact that the deckhouse was not sufficiently strong for the purpose, and it was considered that the expense involved in strengthening it would not be justified.

BROOKEBOROUGH PETTY SESSIONS.

Mr. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland (1) if the Lord Chancellor has been made aware that Mr. James Beatty, J.P., on the 2nd of March last, at Brookeborough Petty Sessions, adjudicated in a case wherein his first cousin was the prosecutor and fined the defendant, a labourer, in the sum of £3; and (2) what action will the Lord Chancellor take in this case?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): A man named Kirkpatrick was summoned to the Petty Sessions at Brookeborough on the date mentioned for trespass in pursuit of game, at the suit of a relative of the Justice referred to. The complainant, however, did not appear, and the case was not heard. The Question mentioned in the second paragraph does not, therefore, arise for consideration.

PLAGUE (INDIAN TRANSPORT "DILWARA").

Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Indian transport Dilwara, which arrived at Southampton on 6th April, had had a fatal case of plague on board during her voyage; whether the local authorities found their sanitary powers sufficient to protect the local health interests; and whether this is the second occasion within the last few months on which the infection of plague on board ship has been successfully dealt with in this country without any resort to quarantine detention of vessels and persons?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: A fatal case of plague occurred on board the Indian transport Dilwara after the vessel had left Bombay. The body was buried at sea; and, under the recent Venice Convention, only the two actual attendants on the sick person were detained at Suez (Moses' Wells), the vessel at once passing through the canal in quarantine. On reaching Southampton on April 6 the Dilwara was met by a medical inspector of the Board, who acted in concert with the military and local port authorities. No further case had occurred, and under the excellent arrangements organised by the port medical officer, all the 1,235 persons on board were allowed to land, and the existing powers were found to be fully sufficient to protect all health interests concerned. The hon. Member is quite correct in his assumption. This is the second occasion within the last few months on which the infection of plague on board ship has been successfully dealt with without resort to any quarantine detention of either vessels or persons. ["Hear, hear!"]

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state the number of clerks employed in the Telegraph Department of the Post Office in offices where the staffs are not amalgamated; and whether he can say how many head postmasters have benefited under the improved scheme resulting from the recommendations of Lord Tweedmouth's Committee?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not at present able to give the information desired, but he will write to the hon. Member on the subject.

TRAIN SERVICE (EUSTON AND HOLYHEAD).

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the London and North Western Railway Company have arranged to run their express trains between Euston and Holyhead at a greatly increased rate of speed, so as to save more than an hour's time on the journey each way; and, if so, why is it that a similar saving of time cannot be effected in the case of the mail trains, so as to allow of a later departure from Dublin and Euston, especially in the mornings?

MR. HANBURY: There is reason to believe that the London and North Western Railway Company intend to accelerate the speed of their express trains between London and Holyhead on the 1st May, and some of these will then perform the journey in rather less time than the corresponding mail trains. The stops of the mail trains, however, are necessarily more numerous and somewhat longer than those of the accelerated trains in connection with the North Wall boats, and to this is mainly due the longer time that will be occupied on the journey. The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that the day mail trains between London and Holyhead have not been accelerated, as no such postal advantages would have been gained therefrom as to justify the additional expense.

Mr. T. W. Russell.

POSTMASTERSHIP (MONAGHAN).

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, with reference to the 83 applications stated to have been received in respect of the recent vacancy in the postmastership of Monaghan, how many of these were from Ireland; of the entire number of the applicants how many, if any, held the position of provincial clerks in charge; what was the respective class rank of each at the time of making application, their respective length of service, and for what portion of such service did they hold the position of provincial clerk in charge; for what period of his 12 years of service did the present postmaster of Monaghan fill this position, and what was his rank according to seniority on the staff of the second class of the Dublin office to which he was attached before receiving his recent promotion; and was Rule 38 of Instructions to Head Postmasters adhered to in the appointment of the Monaghan postmaster?

MR. HANBURY: Of the 83 applicants for the postmastership of Monaghan, 43 were from Ireland and 40 from other parts of the United Kingdom. Of the 83 applicants 10 were provincial clerks in charge; of these 1 was a telegraphist of the first class, with a service of 22 years, having acted as provincial clerk in charge for 9 years. Seven were sorting clerks and telegraphists with service as follows:—22 years, 5 years as provincial clerk in charge; 21 years, 11 years as provincial clerk in charge; 19 years, 10 years as provincial clerk in charge; 12 years, 10 years as provincial clerk in charge; 12 years, 1 year as provincial clerk in charge; 11 years, 9 years as provincial clerk in charge; 8 years, 5 years as provincial clerk in charge. One was a telegraphist of the second class with a service of 20 years, having acted as provincial clerk in charge for 2 years; and one was a sorting clerk of the second class (Mr. Williams, who was appointed postmaster of Monaghan), with a service of 11 years, for 4½ of which he had acted as provincial clerk in charge. The position of the postmaster of Monaghan on the second class of sorting clerks in Dublin was No. 104, on a class numbering 252. So far as the Postmaster of Monaghan is concerned, the Postmasters' Rule No. 38 appears to have been strictly adhered to. He was selected for the postmastership because he was regarded as the best qualified candidate.

RAILWAY CARRIAGES (OVERCROWDING).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the inconvenience and danger to the travelling public resulting from the overcrowding of railway carriages, he will appoint a Committee to inquire into the means which should be adopted to prevent such overcrowding?

Mr. RITCHIE: No, Sir.

Mr. WEIR said that he should call attention to the subject on the Estimates.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (MORAY FIRTH).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state whether any steps have been taken to watch the operations of the German trawler Vigilant, which was allowed to discharge a cargo of fish at Aberdeen on the night of the 28th instant, on the assurance of her captain that the fish were caught off the Danish coast, so that in the event of her fishing in the prohibited waters of the Moray Firth she will not be allowed to land her catch in Scotland; and whether, in view of the threatened descent of the Saturn, Altona, and other foreign trawlers on the Moray Firth, he will arrange for one or more additional cruisers to watch the interests of the line fishermen on the Scottish coasts?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: Instructions have been given to watch the Vigilant. If it should appear that any foreign trawlers intend to land fish caught in prohibited waters, the necessary action will be taken.

RELIEF MONEY AND TAXATION IN ASIA MINOR.

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that in Asia Minor relief supplied to Armenians in money and goods has been seized by the agents of the Turkish Government for alleged arrears of taxation; and whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to prevent the continuance of this conduct by the Turkish Government or their agents?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): Several instances have been reported by Her Majesty's Consular Officers in Asia Minor during the last eighteen months of the seizure of relief money by the Turkish tax collectors. Her Majesty's Embassy at Constantinople have invariably brought these cases to the notice of the Porte, and have received assurances that the proceedings would be checked. In some cases reports have been received that the representations made have been successful, and that the practice has been put a stop to.

ACCIDENT TO PLATELAYERS (GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY).

Mr. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received information as to the fatal accident to platelayers during fog on the Great Northern Railway, near Peterborough, on Wednesday; whether he can state what precautions were taken to protect the gang of platelayers, and especially whether a man was placed to watch for approaching trains; whether fog signals or any appliance for warning the men was employed; and whether one of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade will hold an inquiry into the accident?

Mr. RITCHIE: An inquiry into the causes of this accident was at once ordered. The Inspecting Officer will, of course, report upon all matters connected with the accident.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he intends to propose that the House of Commons shall attend Divine Service in St. Margaret's Church, as the Church of the House, on the 20th of June, the Sunday appointed for national thanksgiving for the Queen's long reign, as in 1887; and, in such case, if he will move Mr. Speaker to invite the Premiers of the self-governing Colonies, who will be in London on that day as the guests of the nation, to accompany the Imperial House of Commons on the occasion, and also any members of Colonial Legislatures then in England who may desire to do so, and make application through their respective Agents General?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to my hon. Friend I have to say that it is impossible at the present time to determine whether the House will be in Session on June 20, or whether we shall be absent on our holidays. ["Hear, hear!"] But until I know with more certainty I ought not to hold out any undue prospects in view of that contingency. It depends upon how we get on with our business, and until I can forecast the probable duration of the holidays I am afraid that I cannot answer my hon. Friend's Question. ["Hear, hear!"]

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND).

MR. A. D. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can say when the Bill, mentioned in the Queen's Speech as having been prepared, for amending the existing procedure with respect to Private Bills from Scotland, will be introduced?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The Bill referred to will be shortly introduced either in this House or in the House of Lords.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

*SIR C. DILKE asked the Vice President of the Council whether the Circular of the Stanton School Board did not reveal facts opposed to the views and intentions of the Government as to balances in necessitous schools; and, if so, by what means he intended to make the matter clear—whether by amendment of the Bill or by amendment of the practice of the Department?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University) said he had seen the Circular, and the facts were substantially correct. The Committee of Council would give the most careful consideration to any Amendments which might be moved to the Necessitous School Boards Bill in Committee.

Sir Howard Vincent.

SUPPLY (IRISH BOARD OF WORKS VOTE).

MR. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury when he proposes to put down the Vote for the Irish Board of Works, and whether he will undertake that the ratepayers of Waterford shall have an opportunity of considering his scheme with regard to the Waterford, Lismore, and Dungarvan Line before the Vote is taken?

MR. HANBURY: No, I do not think I can give any promise, as I understand the 14th has been promised for Irish Votes; but I should be very willing to consult with Irish Members as to whether the Board of Works Vote should be taken on that day or not.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): With regard to the Estimates of the Board of Works, the right hon. Gentleman stated that although Irish Estimates generally came on on the 14th, he will consider the desirability of postponing the Board of Works Estimate to suit the convenience of Irish Members.

MR. HANBURY: Oh, yes. There will be more than one day for Irish Estimates, and, of course, if Irish Members generally wish this Vote to be postponed I shall be glad to do so.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: The point is this—whether, as the right hon. Gentleman has stated that it is not likely that any suggestion with regard to the Waterford, Lismore, and Dungarvan Railway will be known before the 14th, he can postpone the Board of Works Estimate until these suggestions are known to the ratepayers?

MR. HANBURY repeated that he should be willing to do so, if that course were generally desired by Irish Members.

WAYS AND MEANS (BUDGET RESOLUTIONS).

In answer to Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.),

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said the second day of the discussion on the Budget Resolutions would be Thursday next.

MR. A. O'CONNOR gave notice that in Committee of Ways and Means he should move to reduce the duty on tea from 4d. to 2d. in the pound.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[SIXTH ALLOTTED DAY.]

[The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, in the Chair.]

CIVIL SERVICES, 1897-8.

CLASS III.

1. Motion made, and Question proposed:—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £43,177, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries of the Law Officers' Department; the salaries and expenses of the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty's Treasury, Queen's Proctor, and Director of Public Prosecutions; the costs of prosecutions, of other legal proceedings, and of Parliamentary agency."

*MR. PICKERSGILL moved "That Item H (Salaries) be reduced by £100 in respect of the salary of the Director of Public Prosecutions." The hon. Member said there was a great deal of public dissatisfaction with regard to the manner in which the functions of that office were discharged. No doubt the duties were of a difficult and delicate nature, and in any case complaints would be likely to arise, but at present and for some years past dissatisfaction had existed to an extent which ought not to be. Public functionaries were usually animated by a desire to magnify their office, but it was a tradition of this particular office, extending back over a long period of time, to do as little as possible—a position which was consistent neither with the intentions of Parliament under the Act nor with the Regulations made thereunder. Sometimes a rather paltry parsimony was exercised. For instance, in one or two cases mischief had resulted from the Director of Public Prosecutions or his subordinate omitting to take counsel's advice upon evidence before the case came to trial. Then, in regard to the manner in which cases were conducted by the regular counsel appearing for the Treasury, he entirely corroborated the statement that upon some occasions of recent years Treasury counsel had displayed an over-eagerness to secure convictions—a feature which was very unbefitting the dignity of Crown prosecutions and entirely contrary to the better traditions of the Bar. Country cases were often prepared in a perfunctory and unsatisfactory manner, and he attributed that to the terms of remuneration, only half-fees being paid. There was no more reason why the Government should sweat solicitors than workmen. And, in regard to the conduct of cases in Court, he thought some mischief resulted from what might be called dual control. The Public Prosecutor, although responsible, did not himself select the counsel who conducted the cases. It was in the hands of the Attorney General, but if the arrangement was to work satisfactorily it ought to be accompanied by responsibility. In this case, however, the responsibility was with the Public Prosecutor, while the patronage was with the Law Officer of the Crown. Public inconvenience and perhaps a miscarriage of justice arose from this divided control and responsibility. In citing instances of cases which were not taken up by the Public Prosecutor, he mentioned that at the March Sessions of the Central Criminal Court Mr. Commissioner Kerr made some strong observations in a case in which a police constable had been very seriously attacked and injured. The Commissioner thought it was a case in which the Public Prosecutor ought to have intervened. At the next Sessions the Public Prosecutor made his explanation, to the effect that neither by the magistrates nor by the police had his attention been drawn to the case, and he knew nothing about it until he read the remarks in the newspapers. Only the other day a superintendent of police charged a man before a Metropolitan magistrate with wilful murder, though he had not brought the case before the notice of the Public Prosecutor; the officer told the magistrate that he thought it was better he should get the opinion of the magistrate before he informed the Public Prosecutor of the case. That was totally inconsistent with the regulations, which provided that the superintendent or chief officer should at once bring any capital case to the notice of the Public Prosecutor. So many of these cases occurred as to lead one to think that the superintendents of police in the metropolis had received, directly or indirectly, an intimation that the less they troubled the Public Prosecutor the more satisfactory it would be to that official. What was the date of the last occasion on which the Metropolitan Police were reminded of their duties under the statutory regulations? They had been remiss, and he thought that the Public Prosecutor had shown some laxity in not reminding them of their duty. There was another class of cases where a prosecution having been instituted had been withdrawn by the prosecutor himself. At the Mansion House recently a director of a public company was charged with misappropriating £8,000, the property of the company. The prosecutor desired to withdraw; the magistrate sent the papers to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and a short time afterwards the clerk received an intimation that the Public Prosecutor did not propose to take the case up. But the magistrate expressed the opinion that when an information disclosing a criminal offence was laid before a magistrate, such a termination was most unsatisfactory. Again, the use which was made of our criminal courts as a kind of collecting agency, and sometimes for blackmailing purposes, had become a public scandal. The Public Prosecutor was the person who ought to call the attention of the Law Officers of the Crown to this class of cases, and something ought to be done. The case either ought to be proceeded with, if it was a genuine criminal case, or if the process of law was being abused for the purpose of collecting debt or for blackmailing, steps ought to be taken to put a stop to a gross scandal. Then as to cases of perjury. The attention of the Public Prosecutor was constantly being called to such cases, without effect. There had been laxity and remissness on the part of the Public Prosecutor. Only a few weeks ago one of the grossest cases occurred in the Lambeth County Court; it was a bogus case under the Employers' Liability Act, and there was the clearest evidence of perjury on the part of the complainant. Though the case was brought under the notice of the Public Prosecutor, nothing, so far as he knew, had been done. Then there were the cases against bookmakers consequent on the recent decision in "Hawke v. Dunn." The statutory instructions gave very complete power to the Public Prosecutor in regard to any indictable offence to obtain full information from the police as to the commission of the offence, and as to what was being done. They provided the Public Prosecutor with complete means of securing a uniform administration of the law in these cases. But harm was done if the law was enforced in one part of the country and not in another. It was essential that there should be a uniform administration of the law against betting throughout the kingdom.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) admitted that this was a question of great importance. He thought that all those who had to do with the trial of cases agreed that, considering the number which the Public Prosecutor had to conduct, the work was, on the whole, extremely well done. He would undertake to communicate with the Public Prosecutor on the point of counsel being instructed and consulted at the earliest possible stage of a case. Due regard had, he hoped, always been paid to economy, but he did not believe that economical considerations were ever allowed to impede the proper administration of justice. There were four standing Treasury Counsel at the Old Bailey, who acted in accordance with the traditions that had governed prosecutions at the Central Criminal Court for many years. The four gentlemen who now filled the position had done their work admirably. Only two instances of too great eagerness on the part of counsel to obtain a conviction had been brought to his attention in the last four or five years, and those cases had not occurred in London. He had spoken to the gentlemen engaged, and had pointed out to them the rule which should be followed by counsel prosecuting on behalf of the public. The distribution of Treasury briefs in the country was regulated by considerations of fairness and justice, special regard being paid to the legal qualifications of the gentlemen employed. In certain parts of the country, Manchester and Liverpool for example, there were local Public Prosecutors who distributed the greater part of the briefs. That system had not, perhaps, worked in an altogether satisfactory way. If Treasury briefs were distributed in some new way efforts to obtain business which would be unworthy of the legal profession might be encouraged. Irksome, therefore, as the work of distributing these briefs was, it was thought best that in country cases the responsibility of the nomination of counsel should rest where it was. The question of what cases the Public Prosecutor should take up was a very difficult one. That official now took up more cases than he used to do, and acted under the direction of the Attorney General. In bad cases of crime affecting poor people the Public Prosecutor ought not to hesitate about taking action, but it was a different matter when pressure was brought to bear upon him to conduct cases affecting wealthy people who ought themselves to act as prosecutors. These private individuals sometimes initiated prosecutions and conducted them unsuccessfully up to a certain point, and then endeavoured to throw the responsibility of continuing them upon the Public Prosecutor. Although every now and then a case which could be taken up with advantage might escape the attention of the Public Prosecutor, no serious fault could be found with the general way in which he conducted his business. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member that a great many criminal prosecutions had been begun for the purpose of levying blackmail or to obtain the payment of a civil debt, but he would point out that the magistrates before whom such cases came could do more to frustrate the object of those who brought them than the Public Prosecutor could. He did not believe that that official was at all likely to sanction any compromise which would result in the escape of an offender. Careful attention was being bestowed on this class of cases, and still further watchfulness would be exercised if it was thought necessary. He feared he could not give the hon. and learned Member much satisfaction in regard to the subject of betting prosecutions. The action of the police in betting cases was necessarily controlled to a certain extent by the Home Office, and there were practical difficulties in the way of getting cases for trial. He would inquire whether any new instructions had been issued by the Public Prosecutor in consequence of the recent decision to which reference had been made.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to.

2. £22,300, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Legal Expenses.

*SIR H. FOWLER called attention to the cost of the Railway and Canal Commission. He said this was a case in which there ought to be a Return showing the number of sittings held during the year by this highly-paid body. The last Return on the subject showed that the Commission sat only 30 or 40 days in the year. He wished to know whether the Attorney General could give the Committee any information as to the number of times the Commission had sat during the past year?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said the information asked for by the right hon. Gentleman was given at page 211 of the Estimates. With regard to the annual Report, he thought it was just about due, as the last annual Report was signed by the Commissioners in February.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) asked for some explanation of the item for repayment of Sheriffs' expenses.

Mr. HANBURY said it referred to the repayment of certain expenses connected with the attendances of Judges at Assizes.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he wished to know what class of expenses were repaid, and if some expenses incidental to the office were repaid, whether there was any good reason why all the expenses should not be paid?

Mr. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) said that, having served the office of Sheriff, he knew something about the expense. One of the expenses repaid by the Government was the cost of the Judges' lodgings, but the Sheriff still had to provide carriages for the Judges, and to pay his own expenses in the way of entertaining during the Assizes.

Mr. HANBURY said that the ceremonial expenses that were sometimes incurred depended very much on the Sheriff himself. If he went in for pomp and ceremony, he, of course, incurred considerable expense, but ceremonial had to a great extent diminished. As to the charges that were repaid, the principal ones were the expenses in connection with providing lodgings for the Judges. They took up nearly one-half of the item. Other expenses, such as advertising the Assizes and providing refreshment for jurors, were repaid.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES thought this was a very large sum to pay for Judges' lodgings. He understood that each Judge was allowed seven guineas a day expenses on Circuit, and he would have thought that out of that he could very well lodge himself. Of course, it was not possible that the persons of great eminence who now occupied the Bench should do anything of the sort, but the day might come when Judges might like to extend their time in an Assize town longer than was necessary for the performance of their judicial duties. [Laughter.] Consequently he thought that some alteration would have to be made. His objection was that with the seven guineas a day for expenses there ought to be no charge for lodgings made at all, either on the Sheriff or on the country. The right hon. Gentleman was a reformer in these matters, and he hoped he would look into this matter.

Mr. HANBURY said that the actual sum the Judges received for expenses was £7 10s. a day, but he could not say whether the consequences suggested by his hon. Friend were likely to follow. As the payment of the Judges' expenses arose on another Vote, he could not discuss it on this one.

Mr. COURTENAY WARNER said that Sheriffs always had to spend a certain amount of money. They had to supply carriages, and some Judges even insisted on having men standing behind. Trumpeters were also insisted on in some counties; but cut down to the lowest figure the Sheriffs' expenses came to £200. In some large counties they came to £1,000 or £1,500.

*Sir H. FOWLER said the £7 10s. referred to was a composition in lieu of an annual sum of, he thought, £500, which used to be paid for Circuit expenses. In what he had said just now about the Railway Commission, he had not wished to cast any doubt on the manner in which they performed their duties, but simply to point out that on that Commission there were two highly-paid and insufficiently-employed judicial officials, receiving £3,000 a year each, who might be utilised for other judicial work. ["Hear, hear!"]

Vote agreed to.

3. £204,451, to complete the sum for Supreme Court of Judicature.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) hoped some light would be thrown on the various items of this Vote, where there was certainly room for retrenchment. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. R. B. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire) said there was no doubt that the time had come when the items in this Vote should receive careful consideration. He was sure that if the condition of things which existed here existed in any other Department of the State it would have been subjected to a large amount of scrutiny. There was, for instance, the question of the registrars, which should be carefully inquired into, particularly as to whether the staff might not be reduced with economy and efficiency. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought the Government might appoint a Departmental Committee or a small Commission which would bring before the House materials which would enable them to form a judgment.

*Mr. CHARLES HARRISON (Plymouth) pointed out that there was an additional reason why this Vote should be carefully scrutinised with a view to effect greater economy. The judicature fees contributed, in fact, by the litigants and the parties brought in aid and in reduction of the Vote amounted to no less than £383,000; whilst the expenses of all the officers, general staff and clerks of assize in all the Courts only amounted to £378,000. This charge included all the judicial and other staff of the superior courts, and expenses attending the conduct of business in all the superior courts—bankruptcy, lunacy, probate, Admiralty and winding up—and provided for every service but for (1) the maintenance of the buildings, (2) the local rates charged thereon, (3) the stationery, amounting in all to £51,000, and (4) the salaries of the Judges and their pensions, amounting to £192,000. So that practically the public taxpayers found only the buildings, paid the local rates, and paid for the Judges. But against this there was the large profit made from the Court acting as bankers to the funds of those whose affairs were administered by this staff. In this state of the account he thought the taxation on the suitors levied as judicature fee stamps should be reduced, and that on this Vote there should appear as part of the appropriation in aid the large profit made upon the funds banked by the Court. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said the hon. and learned Member had pointed out that there were too many registrars, and he wondered what could be done to make them fewer. Well, he would suggest whether they might not all be made Judges. [Laughter.] He trusted that in a short time they would see that suggestion carried out. He came to a somewhat cognate point—the officers of the Judges. All the managing clerks, etc., were already provided for, but then in addition to these there was a great personal retinue, which was seen to great advantage when the Judges came to the Sheriffs with their javelin men, trumpeters, and the rest. Here there was an item of £17,338 set down for the personal following of the Judges, these Judges being already provided with officers. These personal officials were the remnant of ancient ceremonial which ought to be got rid of. If the Lord Chancellor wanted personal officers, why should he not pay for them out of his £10,000 a year? ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury, who used to sit with him on the other side of the House and who was the only reformer in the Government—[laughter]—should give his attention to the matter. The hon. Member also complained of the overstaffing of the Probate Department. He referred to an item on page 217 with reference to the Probate Division. He made out that there were over 100 persons, clerks, in the Probate Division, and they cost from £30,000 to £40,000 a year. Now that division was mainly occupied in taking care of and making copies of wills. It was a mere survival of the old ecclesiastical jurisdiction which used to have the power of dealing with wills, but the establishment was now nothing but a mere storehouse and the copying place of wills. It ought really to belong to the Inland Revenue Department, which was concerned with the Death Duties. This Probate Department was no longer required. The staff were not lawyers at all; they were clerks purely, and they ought not to be in this Vote at all. They were, he knew, under a most eminent Judge, but their proper place was in the Death Duty Department. He hoped, therefore, that the Secretary for the Treasury would give them a promise that he would look into the matter. He would suggest that his hon. Friend should visit the Department one day in disguise—[laughter]—or send some confidential person to see for him.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that during the last ten or 15 years there had been a continuous reduction of the staff of the High Court, and he personally had come to the conclusion that we had got very near to the point at which we could not stand any further reduction. He had never heard that there were too many Registrars, or that there was sufficient promptitude in getting through the work. As to Masters, and those who were formerly Associates, he was persuaded we had got very near to the lowest point. In the year 1886-87, just ten years ago, the expenditure on salaries of Masters, Registrars, and various other clerks and officers was £299,932, while at the present time it was £268,729. There had been by a reduction in the staff a saving of upwards of £30,000. The total expenditure in 1886-87 was £417,868, and in 1895-96 it was £383,245. There were 21 Masters at the time of the passing of the Judicature Act, but there were now only 18, and in several other offices the number of officials had been reduced. For years past there had been practically continuous investigation under the direction of the Lord Chancellor, with the result he had stated. His hon. Friend the Member for Lynn Regis, who ought to be learned—he believed the hon. Gentleman was entitled to be called learned—[laughter]—was for once mistaken. The hon. Member spoke of the personal retinue of the Judges. For centuries it was the practice for a Judge of the High Court to have two clerks—a senior with £400 a year, and a junior with £200. Now, however, each Judge, except the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls, had only one clerk. That was a body clerk who attended the Judge in Court and on Circuit, and he was quite satisfied there was nobody who really understood the administration of justice who would suggest it was improper that a clerk at £200 or £300 should be provided for each of Her Majesty's Judges. The hon. Member for King's Lynn spoke of mediæval officials in the office of the Lord Chancellor, but for some years now these officials had been done away with. The salaries, which amounted to £3,824, were not for the personal attendants of the Lord Chancellor, but for clerks in the office. As to the Probate Registry, in 1893 a Committee, which sat under the direction of the Lord Chancellor, recommended extensive reforms. Those reforms were now being carried out, and there had been in that department, as in others, a considerable reduction of the staff. It would not be denied that extremely important work was done in the department. He admitted the experience of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis in matters connected with the Death Duties, but he did not think the hon. Gentleman's criticism in respect of the personnel of the Probate Registry was well founded. The hon. Member said the number of clerks might be reduced from 100 to 80. When he asserted that the office was now reorganised, and was being improved under the recommendations of a Committee which sat as recently as 1893, they might take it that the efficiency and good order of the office were not being neglected.

MR. HALDANE said that the Registrars were most capable and efficient public servants, but he asked the Committee to consider what their work was. Including the Court of Appeal dealing with Chancery matters, there were six Chancery Courts. The work the Registrars had to do was to record the formal orders and to take note of the documents read and put in. That, of course, was skilled work, but it was not so difficult as it looked. There were 12 Registrars—two for each Court—with salaries varying from £1,250 to £2,000 a year. These Registrars were assisted by 11 principal clerks, with salaries varying from £400 to £800; and there were besides second and third class clerks. There were altogether for six Courts 12 Registrars, assisted by 27 clerks. Judging from the standard which obtained in ordinary Government Departments, it seemed to him that reform in the Supreme Court of Judicature had not proceeded at that magnificent pace which one would gather from the statement of the Attorney General. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) asked for explanation of the circuit allowances and expenses. Were these paid by the day? How was it that so very large a sum was required, when it was common knowledge that the time of the Judges on circuit was often not fully occupied?

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) said that the circuit arrangements were in a very confused state, and that often the Judges found themselves with nothing to do for two or three days, while the work in London suffered. That was a matter of the rearrangement of circuits; but there was another question involved—namely, the delay which often occurred between the committal and the trial of a prisoner. It frequently happened that a person who had been kept in prison for two, three, or even four months, was found not guilty. It was perfectly shocking that such a state of things could exist. The best solution of the difficulty would be to have a rearrangement of circuits. He knew the difficulties raised by the smaller towns to any such proposal; and he did not wish to see the circuit system unduly interfered with, as far as criminal work was concerned; but something ought to be done to prevent the long imprisonment of innocent persons. He would suggest that the practice of accepting bail should be very largely extended. In ordinary cases the rich men were bailed out and the poor men had to go to prison. It was found that men very seldom forfeited their own recognisances; and, as a matter of fact, poor men could not do so, because they had not the means to fly the country. If the Attorney General could not come to an early settlement of the circuit system, by which the trial of prisoners might be expedited, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would introduce a Bill to make it compulsory to accept a prisoner's own recognisances except in the gravest cases.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said that the circuit allowances of the Judges were calculated at the rate of £7 10s. a day. That system was in lieu of the allowances previously made; but he himself thought that a lump sum would be better than a daily allowance. He was quite alive to the importance of protecting innocent people from the possibility of being kept in gaol; but as to the granting of bail, there had been grave scandals in recent years caused by the escape of criminals to whom bail had been granted. As to remodelling the circuit system, many unsuccessful efforts in that direction had been made. No doubt a long interval sometimes still elapsed between committal and trial, but he hoped that in regard to minor crimes Parliament would extend the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions. It was an almost hopeless task to deal with the circuit question. Directly it was proposed to change the circuit arrangements in respect of any town there was an uproar among the inhabitants of that town. He hoped that some day or other an improved state of things might be brought about; but if it were to be done the House of Commons must turn a deaf ear to the grievances which might really be believed to exist, but which two or three years' experience would dissipate.

*SIR H. FOWLER said that ever since he had been a Member he had heard the Law Officers make the same speech as the Attorney General had just made. The difficulty would never be solved on the present lines. We had the Judges attempting the impossible—to reconcile all sorts of conflicting interests, and to do justice to them all. Not only were there the susceptibilities of the towns, but there were the conflicting claims of the Bar and other professional men concerned, and of the witnesses and experts. But the hopeless difficulty would vanish if the matter were placed in the hands not of Judges, barristers, or lawyers, but of a Government department independent of sectional influences, and regarding first and only the convenience of the public. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of the Treasury could settle the matter in three months. Each scheme which the Judges produced seemed to be worse than the previous one. Judicial time was the property of the country, which paid for it on the most liberal scale, and which was entitled to have justice speedily and cheaply administered. Above all, innocent people—and even guilty people—had a right to speedy trial. In any other department of the State such arrangements would not be tolerated for a moment. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was having a very distinguished career in his office, and the House had every confidence in him—[cheers]—and if the right hon. Gentleman would bring to bear his experience and the strong economic tendencies of the Secretary of the Treasury, who had not yet forgotten all the doctrines which he used to preach—[laughter]—these grievances might be remedied.

MR. EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said that the tardiness of bringing prisoners to trial was a question of great importance. But he could not see how it would be possible to bring in a Bill dispensing with bail altogether, or allowing prisoners returned for trial out on their own recognizances. He thought the question of bail must be left to the magistrates or the Judges, and his experience was that in recent years magistrates and Judges had become more liberal in the exercise of that discretion. He thought the remedy was to be found in the greater utilisation of the County Court Judges. The County Court Judges were not employed continuously, as were the Judges of the High Courts, and as they got salaries that recompensed them for the whole of their time, he had never been able to understand why they should be half the year idle, and why they should not be utilised, like the County Court Judges of Ireland, to deliver the gaols or transact criminal business at every Session. Recent appointments to County Court Judgeships included men of great experience in civil and criminal matters, equal in many respects to appointments in the High Courts; and the remedy for the grievance to which the late Attorney General had drawn attention was to enable the County Court Judges to try prisoners returned for trial and compel them to hold their Courts more promptly.

Sir ROBERT REID said he had not suggested the introduction of a Bill to make it compulsory on magistrates and Judges to allow bail in all cases; but he thought that unless there were strong reasons to the contrary poor prisoners should be allowed out on their own personal recognizances. A prisoner had the right of appeal to a Judge sitting in Chambers when bail was refused, and it must be apparent that that was a privilege open only to fairly well-to-do men. He thought the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University was one in favour of which a great deal might be said. He did not see why the County Court Judges should not be placed, as they could be placed, on the Commission of Assize.

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) did not see why the Law Courts should be shut up 15 or 16 weeks each year, any more than the Foreign Office, the Treasury, or any other Department of the State. He thought the remedy for the grievance complained of was to put an end to the long vacations, and to allow each individual Judge to get his holidays as it was found convenient. Again, in other Departments of the State there was a rule by which men were compelled to retire from the Service at a certain age; and he could not see why that rule should not apply to the Judges—

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: Order, order! The question before the Committee is not the salaries of the Judges.

Mr. GEDGE said he would defer his remarks on the subject till another time.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he sympathised with the hardship inflicted on poor prisoners by not bringing them speedily to trial, but he thought that if poor prisoners were allowed out on their own recognizances, a large proportion of them would never be seen again. It had also been suggested that the County Court Judges should have the power of dealing with criminal cases. That would involve an increase in the number of County Court Judges to try the prisoners. Another proposal was that the Judges should take no holidays at all, or fewer holidays. It therefore came to this, that if all the suggestions were adopted there would be fewer prisoners to try, more Judges to try them, and fewer holidays on the part of the Judges. He thought they ought to be adopted, for they would ultimately lead to a great diminution in legal charges. There was no doubt that the Judges took holidays altogether too long, and that they did not retire with that promptitude that was due to the junior members of the Bar. [Laughter.]

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: The remarks of the hon. Gentleman are now out of order.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he should object to the allowance of £7 10s. per day to the Judges while on circuit. The Judges got large and adequate salaries; first-class railway fares and lodgings for nothing. Was it for food they got the additional £7 10s. per day? He thought it was hardly credible that a Judge could eat £7 10s. per day.

Mr. GEDGE said he did not think there could be much objection to paying this £7 10s. to Judges who were under 65 years of age, but there seemed to be some objection to paying it to those who exceeded that age.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: The hon. Member is now trying to get behind my ruling.

Mr. GEDGE asked whether it would be in order to discuss the manner in which Judges might be unable to perform their duties?

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said it would not be in order to discuss the question of retirement of Judges upon the present item.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES moved to reduce the Vote by £100, in order that they might obtain an assurance on the subject.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.) hoped the hon. Member would not press the Amendment. His experience had been that it was extremely difficult for the Treasury or the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with matters of legal reform in so far as the question of expenditure was concerned. He had had a try many a time in different parts of the United Kingdom, and he could not say that he had hitherto been very successful. All these matters had to be done in consultation, sometimes with the Judges themselves, sometimes with the Lord Chancellor, or other equally high personages, and it was very difficult for the Treasury, whatever their predilections might be, to carry them into effect. The hon. Member for King's Lynn, he understood, had referred to an annual salary instead of the payment per day, and he would promise to look into the matter.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; Vote agreed to.

4. £5,177, to complete the sum for Land Registry.

Mr. HALDANE said the Establishment to which this Vote related might be made more use of. This Establishment was the pivot of the reform which the Government had embodied in the Land Transfer Bill, which was in progress in another place.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said the question of legislation dealing with Land Transfer could not be discussed on that Vote.

Mr. HALDANE said he trusted the office would be made more useful by the passage of the Land Transfer Bill this Session.

Mr. GEORGE LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton) said nothing could be more cumbrous and costly than the system of land transfer in this country. He thought if they were to reduce the fees of the Land Registry Office and bring them more into conformity with those in force on the Continent, the usefulness of the office would be increased. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would re-appoint the Committee in regard to this matter in accordance with the promise which he (the Leader of the House) made last year. That Committee took a great deal of evidence all on one side of the question, that was the lawyer's side, and there was no evidence taken on the other side. Among the Parliamentary Papers which had been circulated was a Report of the Assistant Registrar of the Land Registry Office, as to the system of Land Transfer on the Continent, which seemed to be giving complete satisfaction. In some countries thousands of pounds in land could be transferred for £1 10s.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS said if the hon. Gentleman had any suggestion to make by means of which the Land Registry Office could be made more useful under the existing legislation, he would be in order, but if the only suggestion he could make was that certain fresh legislation should be introduced in order to make the office more useful, he would not be in order.

Mr. LAMBERT said that if the fees were reduced it would be an enormous benefit to some mortgagees. He concluded by urging that the Committee should be re-appointed and the whole matter thoroughly sifted, so as to make the office more useful and efficient.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said he had not the slightest recollection of having given such a promise with reference to the Committee. He would communicate with his right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and ascertain whether a promise was given on the point. With regard to the Office itself he agreed that possibly some reduction of fees might be desirable, but he would point out that until quite recently the complaint used to be made that the expenditure upon the Office was not in any way justified. At the present time, however, there was a very considerable profit from this Office to the country, a profit of something like £13,000 a year. There was a continuous increase in the usefulness of the Office. Whereas in 1893 there were 357 conveyances and transfers through the Office, in 1896 there were 525. The total transactions through the Office had increased from 840 in 1893 to 1,116 in 1896. He thought the Office was continually growing in favour, and he hoped the public year by year would appreciate it more.

SIR R. REID thought the fees were a great deal too high, and that the profit which the Exchequer was deriving from the Office was too great, and was calculated to retard to some extent an advance in the registration of land. There was another reason which was of a more delicate character, but which it was possible to advert to without making—as he would be far from making—the least suggestion of anything but perfectly honourable conduct. But many solicitors, who were naturally the trusted advisers of the owners of land, did not believe in the present system of land registration, and thought it open to many objections. He himself believed it was far from perfect. But even now the Act establishing that office was a most useful Act, and if solicitors had been able to regard it in the way he did, more estates would have been registered there. No doubt one great cause of the inutility of the Act was that it had not inspired confidence among the solicitors of the country. The Committee on the subject of land transfer, of which he was Chairman two years ago, was not appointed, because there had never before been inquiry into it. During the last 40 years there had been at least half-a-dozen Inquiries by Royal Commissions and Select Committees of both Houses. There had been four or five inquiries even during the last twenty years. For 200 years there had been inquiries going on, even since that industrious man Cromwell expressed an opinion on the subject which he himself believed was justified by the facts. But the inquiry of 1895 arose from the special circumstances that the Government had made a bargain with the Incorporated Law Society that their objections to the Land Transfer Bill should be fairly heard, that the evidence should be limited to a certain period, and that meanwhile the Bill should be Read a Second time. The most valuable evidence was given. Mr. Lake, one of the first conveyancers in this country, gave evidence which impressed him, as Chairman of the Committee, greatly. It was temperate, reasonable, and showed complete mastery of the subject. After hearing all that was to be said against the Bill the Committee was dissolved, and had never been reappointed. He did not think there was any necessity for the reappointment of the Committee, because he believed those who studied the evidence would be satisfied that a decided measure of reform was needed. Any further inquiry, after all the inquiries that had taken place, would simply delay registration. He hoped that, at an early date, the Government would bring before the House the Bill which had been introduced into the House of Lords. Whatever assistance it was in his power to render to pass that Bill, he would most gladly render. Meantime he did not think they ought to make any complaint of land registry, because he believed that the officers of the Land Registry Office, who had shown much zeal and ability in fulfilling their duties under the present law, would be able to work any new system with the most complete success.

MR. HALDANE said it was true that the most valuable evidence was given before the Select Committee. But this winter a small Departmental Committee was appointed to scrutinise the evidence taken, and to consider such changes in the Government reforms which would bring them into harmony with the evidence. This had been done, and he might say that the Land Transfer Bill was no longer a contentious Measure. The business of the Land Registry could be put completely on its proper basis without the controversies they formerly had. There was now no controversy between the Government and the leading opponents of this reform, and there should be no difficulty in getting it through easily and quickly. He reminded the Committee with regard to the fees, that the Land Registry Office now transacted the business of the Middlesex Land Registry, and a large proportion of the fees came from the latter, which had nothing to do with land transfer, but with the registry of deeds. Without the consent of the noble Lord, who received a third of the fees derived, he did not know how the fees could be altered. He himself hoped the system would not be perpetuated when an opportunity occurred for putting an end to it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he was not in a position to make any pledge to the Committee with regard to the Land Transfer Bill. It was receiving the anxious attention of the Lord Chancellor, and he hoped to pass a Measure through the Upper House which would not be open to the objection to which his previous efforts in the same direction had been. If there was no opposition to the Bill in this House, he hoped that before long the Bill would become law. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. LAMBERT said the ex-Attorney General was a great authority on the subject, and if he did not think the reappointment necessary, he himself was prepared to acquiesce. But if making the Land Registry Office more efficient depended on the consent of the lawyers, it would probably remain inefficient for a long time. Its greater efficiency would take bread and cheese out of their mouths, and to that they would never consent.

Mr. GEDGE said he thought he might claim on behalf of his profession that they had sufficient common sense to know that they could not set up the interests of their class against the public interests. They did not desire that the business which they did should be done at the expense of the taxpayers—they did not think that right; but he was sure they would heartily welcome any system of land registration which was good for their clients. The objections they had to land registration as it now stood were not universal. The present system suited no particular estates, and all who had to do with such estates carried them into the Land Registry. The objections were not universally applicable, because if so, solicitors of the present generation—at least those who had attained his age—would carry all estates into the Land Registry Office. Then they would make their fortunes and be able to retire comfortably, and leave their successors to get what they could out of it. He was glad to learn that the Incorporated Law Society were satisfied with the Bill as it stood, so he hoped there would be a re-appointment of the Committee of that House, and that upon the evidence they had before them the Bill would be Read a Second time, and referred to the Standing Committee on Law, where minor defects would be eradicated.

Mr. HALDANE wished to say that he had no authority to say anything on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society. But Mr. Lake, who gave valuable evidence before the Committee, had assented to the changes made in the Bill to make it agree with the evidence given before the Committee, and had written publicly to the newspapers, saying that he was satisfied with the Bill which he once opposed, and that so far from opposing it, he was in favour of giving every assistance to pass it into law.

Mr. WARNER said that in spite of what had been said by the lawyers who had taken part in the Debate, there was a feeling of distrust as to their policy in reference to the Bill. He asked for some statement on behalf of the Government that they would try and reduce the fees in the Land Registry Office. He hoped that the Law Officers of the Crown would act so disinterestedly as to reduce the fees which were charged in the Land Registry Office in connection with transactions out of which the legal profession did so well. If the fees were reduced more and more estates would go through the office, and its business would increase.

Mr. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) could assure the Committee that both solicitors and the Bar were honestly endeavouring to see what could be accomplished in the direction of land transfer.

Mr. ALFRED HOPKINSON (Wilts, Cricklade) urged upon the Government the importance of bringing the Measure dealing with land transfer before the House, so that provision might be made for a much more extended system of land transfer by registration than they had at present. As a matter of fact, lawyers had not been the opponents of the principle of land transfer by registration, but what they had opposed was ill-considered schemes. For many years lawyers had been constantly urging the importance of the introduction of a sound scheme of transfer by registration, and he hoped the Government would recognise the necessity of dealing with the matter.

Vote agreed to.

5. Motion made, and Question proposed:—

"That a sum, not exceeding £23,071, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses connected with the County Courts."

*MR. HARRISON pointed out that the receipts from litigants in the County Courts reached the enormous sum of £465,000. The expenses were put at £457,000, which balanced it within £9,000, and the Consolidated Fund paid for the buildings, for the rates and taxes on the buildings, and £82,000 for the Judges. That being so, he ventured to think that something should be done by the Treasury to reduce the fees which were paid by litigants, and which were now much too great.

SIR R. REID observed that this Vote included an item of £3,000 for the conveyance of persons committed to prison. These persons were unhappy debtors, who were sent to prison, in the eyes of the law, because they had been guilty of contumacious conduct in not obeying the orders of the Court by paying debts due by them. The fact was they were sent to prison because they could not pay the sums of money which the County Court Judge had ordered they should pay. He thought this or any other occasion ought to be utilised for the purpose of pointing out what really went on under this system of County Court debtors' summonses. County Court Judges were required to make orders that the money should be paid within a month or six weeks, or by some such instalments, and then they made a contingent committal order, so that if the man did not pay within the time specified he was sent to prison, where he was lodged at the expense of Her Majesty's subjects at large. That was the system, and it was nothing in the world but a modified form of the old system of imprisonment for debt. It derived its origin from that old system, and, to his mind, the time had now come when it should be abolished altogether. [" Hear, hear!"] A Committee sat some two or three years ago, and made rather an inconsequential Report, the County Court Judges differing in giving their evidence on the subject. But the question presented a broad principle, which was whether or not they were to allow persons to be sent to prison for not obeying orders to pay money. If they had no property upon which execution could be levied, the creditor must stand his chance and pay the penalty of having given credit where he ought not to have given it. [" Hear, hear!"] There was one point which made this matter specially hard. Supposing a debtor owed more than £50, he could get rid of all liability for imprisonment or anything else by becoming a bankrupt. It was the small debtor who owed 10s. or 20s., or £10 or £15 at the outside, who was the victim of this abominable system by which he was sent to prison for not paying his debts. [" Hear, hear!"] It was ridiculous to say such a man was sent to prison not for not paying his debts, but for contumacy in not obeying the order of the Judge, and that imprisonment for debt no longer existed. It was the fact that imprisonment for debt did really exist in such cases as he had instanced. He hoped, therefore, the Government would take the matter in hand and bring about a small but valuable reform which would be acceptable to everybody except that class of tradesmen who gave credit knowing they had behind them the County Court, which enabled them to put the screw on unfortunate debtors by fear of imprisonment. [" Hear, hear!"]

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said a worse class of sharks did not exist in this country than those persons to whom tradesmen sold their debts at about a shilling in the pound, and he was happy to think that the majority of County Court Judges themselves strongly protested against this practice, and that they had of recent years more and more set their faces against it. [" Hear, hear!"] He hoped the occasional pressure which had been applied in that House in questions put to the Attorney General would be discouraged. He was quite sure that if hon. Members who had put questions trying to get harder treatment for the poor in this respect really knew the facts of the practice to which he had referred they would not ask the questions again. The authorities deserved to be supported in the attempts they had made by circulars to County Court Judges to discourage the practice. The majority of those Judges, he believed, had done enormous public service in recent years by discouraging the practice, and that House ought to support them and strengthen their hands instead of trying to weaken them by the asking of such questions as had been put this Session. He thought powerful support might be given to a better view of such question, if from time to time some of the strongest County Court Judges were placed on the Bench of the High Court.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said he agreed that, where a County Court Judge found that a debt was being enforced for the benefit of the person who had bought the debt, the power of imprisonment should not be exercised, and he thought this was recognised by most County Court Judges. But he could not go as far as the late Attorney General with reference to this practice of what the hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought, wrongly called imprisonment for debt. He knew from the County Court Judges themselves that an order for imprisonment was never made unless they were satisfied that the man had had the means to pay and would not. ["Hear, hear!"] He quite agreed that ordinary imprisonment for debt ought to be put an end to altogether, and that they had done to a large extent. But it must be remembered that there were not only cases where a traveller had gone round and given credit, but cases where money had been lent and where work had been done for wages, and yet the man who really ought to pay would not pay. He knew from the County Court Judges throughout the length and breadth of the land that, as far as they could, they never made an order unless they were satisfied that there had been that sort of unfair keeping back of a small sum of money from a man who really wanted it. He thought a little too much had been said in favour of the man who was avoiding the payment of debts he could pay, and not quite enough consideration had been shown for the small plaintiffs, who really very often wanted the money quite as much. Therefore, while they ought not to encourge the practice to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean had referred, on the other hand they ought to see that where there was a small sum due to a plaintiff and where there had been a contumacious refusal to pay, the County Court Judges ought to have the power of imprisonment. As he had already said, he did not believe that Connty Court Judges as a rule ever made an order except they honestly believed that a man had had the means of payment and would not pay, and in those circumstances he felt it was too strong a measure to abolish this power altogether. Such a course would, he thought, encourage that class of persons who would not pay debts that they could properly pay.

SIR C. CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton) said he had listened to this Debate with some interest, inasmuch as a good many years ago he succeeded in abolishing altogether exactly the same practice in Scotland as was now said not to exist in England. In Scotland the people were not imprisoned for debt for some centuries. They were put there for high treason—[laughter]—because they refused to obey the order of the Crown, as conveyed to them through the Judges, to pay debts for the payment of which they had no money. In the case of Scotland, they had a Committee on the subject, and they found that imprisonment for debt was generally enforced for the benefit of people who bought up debts at a shilling in the pound; or, at all events, for the benefit of debt-collecting agencies, who constantly made use of the threat of imprisonment in order to get a mother or a brother, or someone else who did not owe the debt, to pay the money. Imprisonment for debt had been altogether abolished in Scotland, and the same law was now applied to the poor man as to the rich man. That surely was an equitable system of law, which they should aim at procuring for England as well as for Scotland. By way of protest against the present system which obtained in England, he begged to move "That Item H, of £3,000, for Conveyance of Persons Committed to Prison, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said it was extremely inconvenient that a question so large should be discussed on a Vote of this kind. The question was a very serious one. It involved such matters as were raised by the Attorney General as to whether they should allow the transferee of a debt to exercise the rights which belonged to the original owner of the debt. He thought they should. If he had bought a debt he had the same right to such powers of collecting as the law gave the original owner. Other matters were involved. There was the question of the injury that might be inflicted on the debtors themselves, because they might be refused credit. The rights of property were involved, and he thought it was impossible, on a Vote of this kind, to discuss the matter. If it was desired to alter the law there was a proper method to do it. It was not proper on a side issue like this, involving relatively a small sum and really no principle, to raise a matter which really did involve an important principle requiring adequate discussion.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea Boroughs) said he agreed with the Attorney General generally that if they took the whole course of County Court proceedings over any year, he thought it would be found that in no case was anybody sent to prison unless there had been some substantial evidence laid before the Court that he had had the means to pay the whole or some part of the debt and had contumaciously refused to obey the order of the Court. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not approve of the credit system created by the facilities given for the collection of debt by the County Court system; but still, he believed, it was necessary to retain the present power in the hands of the Court. While he would vote against the reduction, he would like to suggest to the Attorney General whether it would not be possible to put some amending words in the Act of 1869 which might lighten the difficulties of the County Court Judge and give him a larger indication of the kind of proof of means on which he should act. The question of the assignment of debts was most difficult from a practical point of view. A man who purchased a debt was as much entitled to sue as the original creditor, and it would be a retrograde step were the House to attempt to fetter him. At the same time abuses had arisen of which the County Court Judges were perfectly alive, and which they were doing everything possible to discourage.

Mr. W. AMBROSE said it was rather a surprise to him to find that when a man was sent to prison for debt the cost of conveying him there came out of public funds. It might, however, be that fees were charged which covered the cost. He had always regarded it as a pretence to say that imprisonment for debt was abolished when they retained the present system. What the County Court Judge did was to ask what a man's wages were, and to estimate what he could spare out of those wages. He did not go into the affairs of the debtor, or take account of his other obligations. Five or six orders might be made against a man, but the County Court Judge did not feel at liberty to take into consideration the orders he had previously made. Why should the man in a humble position of life be punished for debt in a way in which a man in a higher state of prosperity would not be. Was the poor man the only man who was guilty of this offence? He knew that upon one hand it was said if they had not this power they would deprive a man of the means of getting credit. But, on the other hand, it was made the means of mortgaging wages to an extent that was not justified. This was especially the case with regard to travelling dealers who extorted orders from poor people, and relied on this cruel system for securing payment.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES said the hon. Member had forgotten the Administration Order system introduced by the Bankruptcy Act. In the Courts which he knew this system worked very well. The whole position was taken into account, and all practical hardship was done away with.

Sir R. REID said the Administration Order system was an illustration of the difference in the way in which the law treated a small debtor and a large debtor. If a man could afford the luxury of getting into debt for an amount above £50 he could take bankruptcy proceedings himself, and thereby relieve himself from the clutches of any Court, and from the liability to imprisonment. But if the debt was of smaller amount then, although the debtor might by the method of Administration Order, have his debts diminished, he still remained liable to have a mortgage on his future earnings, subject to the penalty of imprisonment if he did not comply with the order made. This was not a very convenient occasion for raising the question. But nowadays Supply afforded almost the only opportunity for bringing forward such matters, and if his hon. Friend went to a division, he would support him.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 54; Noes, 133.—(Division List, No. 189.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

6. £3,400, to complete the sum for Police Courts, London and Sheerness.

*MR. HARRISON called attention to the increasing charge under this head, and alleged that this was due to intrusting the levying of the money in the hands of the Chief Commissioner of Police, instead of placing the control in the hands of a representative body. He stated that when the Act was passed to establish the Metropolitan Police, the rate was limited to 8d. in the pound on the rateable value. It had since been increased 1d. It was levied over the whole area not only of the Metropolis but practically of 20 miles round.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: I do not quite follow how the hon. Gentleman connects his arguments with the Vote.

*MR. HARRISON said he was endeavouring to point out that the expenditure of £12,734 which they now asked for was due to entrusting the levying of it to on unrepresentative body, instead of vesting the control in a representative, and that the expenditure was unduly large in consequence.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: If the hon. Member means to argue that the Metropolitan Police Force ought to be placed under the London County Council, that would require legislation, and would not be in order on the present Vote.

*MR. HARRISON said he did not suggest that there should be any alteration, but he proposed the amount levied in respect of these expenses by the Commissioner of Police should be reduced.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: There are no rates levied in respect of the Metropolitan Police Courts. This is a sum charged on the Exchequer. If the hon. Member raises a question of rates, that cannot be discussed in Committee of Supply.

*MR. HARRISON said he had proposed to move to reduce the Vote asked for. His argument was that the expenditure of £21,039 was out of all proportion to the duties that were performed, and they would not reach that amount were the management of Committees in other hands, and under a representative body. He urged, therefore, that the Vote should be reduced so as to bring the expenditure on the Metropolitan Police Courts within that reasonable amount which would make them at all events self-supporting out of the fees, and they ought not now to be charged on the Consolidated Fund to the extent proposed by this Vote. There was an expenditure which at present was contributed partly by the Consolidated Fund and partly out of the Metropolitan Police rate. ["No!"]

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The hon. Member is in error. The Metropolitan Police rate does not arise on this Vote.

*MR. HARRISON pointed out that during the past two or three years this expenditure had been gradually increasing, and it was to this fact he desired to call attention.

Vote agreed to.

7. Motion made and Question proposed:—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £41,107, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries of the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police, and of the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District, the pay and expenses of officers of Metropolitan Police employed on special duties, and the salaries and expenses of the Inspectors of Constabulary."

*MR. PICKERSGILL called attention to the subject of police supervision. A large body of opinion existed in this country to the effect that police supervision was the most mischievous expedient ever devised by any country to prevent a man who had once gone wrong from acquiring with reasonable ease a foothold in society again. It was a remarkable fact that at the Central Criminal Court sentences of police supervision had not been imposed for many years, because he believed that the Recorders had been largely influenced by the opinion held and expressed by Colonel Fraser, the late Chief of the City Police. This gentleman held the view that a man who intended to relapse into crime snapped his fingers at police supervision, that was to say he disappeared and never reported himself, whereas the man who had fallen casually and meant to try to lead an honest life was he who reported himself, and by means of constant harrassing was prevented from earning an honest livelihood. He wanted some statistics to show how this system worked, and whether or not the system was a success as measured by its results. Further, he would like to know how many of the persons subject to police supervision actually reported themselves. This information was in the possession of the Criminal Investigation Department. Did the system given the police any effective hold over the habitual criminal, who meant to relapse into crime? He contended that it did not. Would the Home Secretary grant the Return for which he had pressed? Many believed that the system was a failure, and if that was so he thought a primâ facie case had been made out for further investigation. A Committee ought to be appointed, by preference a Select Committee; or if that was not thought to be desirable, a Departmental Committee, with two independent Members of the House of Commons upon it. Would the right hon. Gentleman grant such a Committee? He moved "That item A (Salaries) be reduced by £100, in respect of the Salary of the Chairman of Commissioners and Directors."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool) said that, as he had explained on a previous occasion, the object of police supervision was not to inflict any extra punishment on criminals. The object was twofold—partly to protect society and partly to render it possible to inflict shorter periods of imprisonment upon prisoners. He had never examined the question in detail, and was not prepared to say whether on the whole the system was a success or not. He quite recognised that it might be very desirable to see how far the results of the system had justified the anticipations of those who introduced it. If, therefore, the hon. Member opposite would communicate to him the kind of information and return which he (Mr. Pickersgill) thought could be supplied he would do his best to provide it. There was no desire on the part of the Home Office or of the police to keep anything back. Undoubtedly the system ought to be clearly understood by the public—["hear, hear!"]—and he was only anxious that the facts should be fully known. If it should appear that the system had not worked satisfactorily he would be quite prepared to consider how it could be improved.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich) asked for an explanation with regard to a matter which had caused a great deal of discontent among the Police of London. He referred to the alteration of the system under which boots were supplied to the force. Unless he had been misinformed, the Police were very dissatisfied with the change. They feared that they would be deprived of a great part of the value of the boots at present provided for them.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY assured the noble Lord that the alteration of the system under which boots were supplied to the Police had been accepted by the force by an overwhelming majority, and that he had not heard a single expression of dissatisfaction at the change. When he came into office, an intimation had been given to the force that a money allowance would be given to them in order that they might provide their own boots. At first sight it might be thought that the change would cause the members of the force some pecuniary loss, but he could assure the Committee that the contrary was the case.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) congratulated the Home Office on the adoption of the anthropometric measurement of criminals. The system had been adopted with great advantage in foreign countries, and he had no doubt that it would be scientifically and practically useful in this country also.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY observed that the system was instituted by his predecessor. It was working very well, and was applied throughout the prisons of this country.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

8. Motion made, and Question proposed:—

> "That a sum, not exceeding £420,851, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the expenses of the Prisons in England, Wales and the Colonies."

*Mr. PICKERSGILL drew attention to the shooting of a convict by warders at Dartmoor on Christmas Day. He said that the conduct of the warders had been defended on the ground that it was in accordance with the instructions which they received. One of the orders relating to convict prisons said:—

> "In the case of a convict who is seen to run away or make an attempt to escape, there is so little chance of success when an immediate pursuit can be made that the use of firearms would not be justified."

Those words certainly did not justify the warders' action on the occasion to which he referred. Another of the orders said:—

> "The object of firing being mainly to induce the convict to stop while in the act of effecting his escape, it would be advisable that the first shot at least should be wide of the mark, and if it should be necessary to fire again that the aim should be low, which would avoid the danger of wounding a vital part."

That was very plain, but what were the facts in the case under consideration? The medical evidence showed that the liver and the right lung of the deceased man were torn by 13 slugs. There was some question as to the distance at which the man was from the warders when they fired. On that point there was great conflict of evidence, but the medical evidence did corroborate the testimony of the other convicts, that the distance at which the man was from the warders when he was shot was exceedingly short. His first point, therefore, was that the warders exceeded their instructions, and that they were not justified by the letter of the Standing Order in taking the life of this man. But assuming the warders did not exceed their instructions, on what authority did the right hon. Gentleman and the Prison Commissioners make this order? The right hon. Gentleman relied on an old dictum of the Common Law that a felon might be killed if his escape could not otherwise be prevented; but that dictum came into vogue many centuries ago, and was usually applied in this way, that if a man tried to escape, not from prison, for punishment by imprisonment was not inflicted in those days, but from justice, he might be killed. Punishment for felony in those days was in almost all cases death, and thus then was the closest relation between the risk which a person ran in seeking to evade justice and the risk which he incurred if he submitted to trial. Now punishment for felony might be only a few days' imprisonment, and yet according to the principle relied on by the right hon. Gentleman, if a prisoner, from wantonness or any other cause, tried to escape, a warder might shoot him down. He submitted that it was altogether wrong to base a modern order on this ancient and obsolete rule. Again, a large proportion of the prison population were only misdemeanants and this rule did not apply to them, and if the escape of misdemeanants could be prevented without it, why not the escape of felons? ["Hear, hear!"] It was said that the circumstances of this case had been investigated. They had, but only by a Coroner's jury at Princetown, and he contended that a Coroner's jury drawn from the population in the immediate neighbourhood of a prison could not be considered an independent tribunal. These warders ought to have been put on their trial at the Devon Assizes, but it was too late to do that now. It was not too late, however, to prevent the recurrence of such a thing. The suggestion he made a few weeks ago was a very moderate suggestion—namely, that there should be a Select or Departmental Committee appointed to consider the law and practice with reference to the prevention of the escape of prisoners. ["Hear, hear!"] His final question was, then, would the right hon. Gentleman assent to that very reasonable request? If nothing was done, it would inevitably happen some day or other, with this case as a precedent, that warders would shoot a man down, and would be put in a criminal dock on a charge of murder. He begged to move the reduction of the Vote.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock) thought that the warders had a considerable grievance. They had the warders compared with the London police, but as so compared the warders had a considerable grievance. The London police joined at the age of 21, and after 26 years' service they could voluntarily retire on two-thirds their pay. Thus the London policeman could retire at 47. He was not saying that that was too liberal, but he did say that the state of the warders as compared with the London police was not what it ought to be. A warder could not retire until he was 64 years of age. The work of a warder, he had no doubt, was harder and much more dangerous and disagreeable than the work of a policeman. The hours of the warder were longer than those of a London policeman. In one case it was eight hours a day, and in the other ten hours. There was also a question as to the clerks and storekeepers, who joined under a special agreement, which was a privileged one. They joined under nomination, and they had to pay a fee of £3. By that payment they were led to believe that they would have certain advantages not possessed by other clerks. It was said at the time of their nomination that they would receive £400 a year salary. What they contended was that the conditions explicitly laid down should be fulfilled. He asked the Home Secretary that full consideration should be given to the grievances of these men.

General GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith) said he should like to add his appeal to that which had just been made with regard to the case of the warders, who, many thought, ought to be able to retire at an earlier age. At the same time they wanted to have a little more freedom. Their employment was very laborious and monotonous, and he hoped the Home Secretary would see that more opportunities of recreation were provided for them at the time they were not on duty. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) said he entirely agreed with what had been said with regard to the prison staff. He had himself brought forward their case, but in vain. He had considered the case very carefully in all its bearings, and he had no hesitation in saying that the treatment they had received was discreditable to the Administration. He did not believe there was a man sitting on the Government Benches who would think of treating any servant as these warders were kept as to the terms of service, as to their families, and as to their promotions. They were men who had been misled. He was sick and tired of urging their claims. He had been into a large number of prisons, local and convict, and he had no hesitation in saying that in many prisons he would rather be in the position of a prisoner than a warder. There was no comparison between a London policeman and that of a prison warder. The warder's position was most depressing and most responsible. He was often in immediate danger, of which he was perfectly conscious, and yet he must not admit it even by a look. The warders had to keep their tempers—one of the most important qualifications. Surely these men should not be left suffering under a sense of injustice. ["Hear, hear!"] What was the promotion for these men? A matter of a few shillings a week for men who had served five, ten, or 20 years. Then, again, with regard to sleeping out, they had a very small allowance, and they would be glad to sleep out much oftener than they are allowed. They ought to be allowed more for lodging allowance, or, at any rate, if they did lodge outside they might be allowed to live more like human beings than they were. The warders were in charge of men who, after all, were just like Members of the House of Commons though they were convicts. If hon. Members' antecedents and surroundings had been like the convicts he wondered how many hon. Members would be very much better. Convicts were human and were amenable to the influences which affected humanity. The warders had absolute authority over them, and if the warders were not men who could exercise self-control, if they were not themselves in a peaceful state of mind, if they were suffering under a sense of wrong and injustice, it was very likely they would make the convicts suffer more than they need. That there were men in the prison service who were horrible tyrants to the men under them could not be denied, and he supposed it was almost impossible to prevent it. He asked, however, that the warders should not be men of a discontented class as they were now. Wherever promotion was possible promotion should be given, where there were vacancies they should be filled up, and everything should be done which would make the life of the men as comfortable as the circumstances would permit. There was one other point he wished to raise. He had reason to believe that, in one prison at least—in Dartmoor—there was a system under which warders could obtain drink within the prison walls either for cash or on credit. Some of the warders had taken very extensive credit; indeed, he was afraid to mention the sums of money which three warders owed for drink. He feared that in view of the largeness of the bills it was perfectly impossible that the three warders could have done their duty properly. Whether the system he referred to existed elsewhere he did not know, but surely it was most important that amongst men who had charge of convicts sobriety should be strictly enforced.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) said that, as the representative of a large number of warders, he had on more than one occasion pressed upon the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessor the grievances under which warders suffered. There was a good deal in what fell from the hon. Member for East Donegal; if warders were discontented it stood to reason injury would be done to their work. He did not believe there was anything like tyranny in convict prisons, but there was no doubt that if warders felt they had considerable grievances, as they did, the probability was they would not treat the prisoners with that care and consideration which even prisoners ought to receive. He could not help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman might well consider the great hardships of the warders' position. Its unpleasantness was indescribable when it was compared with that of the Metropolitan policemen. The last time he was at a convict prison he was told it was very difficult to get work out of convicts, and that the work of a convict was only about half as valuable as that of a free man. The Committee could realise the driving which must be required from the warders under such circumstances. The case which the hon. Member for Bethnal Green had cited showed very clearly what an enormous responsibility was thrown upon warders, a responsibility out of all proportion to that which was thrown upon a policeman. He trusted that the Home Secretary would turn his attention to the grievances of the men, and be able to find some redress.

Mr. W. O. CLOUGH (Portsmouth) said there was a large number of warders in the constituency he represented, and he could assure the Home Secretary that the feeling of discontent which had been mentioned was very widespread. It was very important that every class of public servants should have before them the prospect of promotion, and that they should feel they would be justly dealt with when vacancies occurred. The warders were undoubtedly dissatisfied, and it was in the general interest that the Home Secretary should endeavour to give them redress.

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said that he was not at all disposed to underrate the position and responsibilities of the warders in convict prisons; and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had given ample reasons why prison warders should be not only first-class public servants, but men contented with their position. He had not been aware that there was anything like the spirit of unrest and discontent among the warders which had been represented during the discussion. Four or five years ago the whole case was gone into by a Committee, presided over by Lord de Ramsay. The Committee made certain representations as to salaries, and for once the Treasury gave way, and something was done to improve the conditon of the warders. Since then further demands had arisen, especially in regard to pensions. He was not prepared to admit that the prison warders stood on quite the same footing as the Metropolitan Police, but he was aware of their special responsibilities and of their tedious and solitary duties. The hon. and learned Member for East Donegal had said that throughout the prison service generally there was a better and more humane spirit than there used to be, and there was no class of public servants whose interests were more deserving of attention than the warders. As to the stagnation of promotion he had not received complaints. He did not know whether promotion was always within one prison, but the point was worthy of consideration. He would give his attention to all the points which had been raised. He would inquire into the case at Dartmoor. He had heard that there was a system there by which warders could obtain beer, but it had never been suggested that the system had led to excessive drinking. As to the prison clerks, he could not reopen the question of the £3 for examination. The changes of the last two years had materially improved the position of the prison clerks. The creation of a new class of governors and storekeepers had been a great boon to them; four or five promotions had been made already, and indeed all the higher posts of the profession were now open to these clerks.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR said that if the right hon. Gentleman would compare the Returns for English and Irish prisons, nominally administered under the same law, he would find that the number of reports and punishments was much higher in the former than the latter. In Irish prisons, for instance, corporal punishment was almost unknown. It was significant, too, that the rates of mortality, sickness, insanity, and suicide were much lower in Irish than in English prisons.

General GOLDSWORTHY said that the warders complained of the excessive strain sometimes put upon them.

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said that though he would look into the points raised he could not promise to satisfy them.

Vote agreed to.

On the return of the Chairman of Ways and Means, after the usual interval, 9. £126,130, to complete the sum for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne) referred to the necessity for the reform of the management of reformatory and industrial school ships. They were chiefly maintained by public funds, which came to a large sum in the aggregate, and the country did not get its money's worth in return. A reformatory school ship which did nothing but reform and instruct was the worst class of school to which children who had done wrong could be sent, unless they were trained to become sailors. The number of lads from reformatory and industrial school ships sent to sea had considerably diminished. If these ships were properly worked they would become important feeders for the waste of life which went on in the Mercantile Marine. The Mercantile Marine had always been looked upon as a reserve for the Navy in time of war. It was no longer so, and the places of English seamen were being taken by foreigners. His argument was vindicated by the Report of the Departmental Committee. It recommended that 13 should be the minimum age for admission to the ships, and at 15 boys should be sent to sea. Reformatory and industrial school ships should be affiliated with similar schools on land, from which boys could volunteer for a sea training. The schools on land did not like parting with their best boys, but that was a trivial matter compared with the training of the boys on the ships. The naval inspection of the ships had been attended by beneficial results as regards discipline and industrial training. But a proper staff was required on board. Then the code for the education of the boys needed revision. The complaint was that the same code was used for boys of 14 and 15 which was used in land schools for boys of 11. The main point was that the schools should be regarded by the Home Office as Government institutions, which they really were. The private subscriptions and the contributions of the parents were so small as to be almost beneath notice. The schools were maintained largely by School Boards and County Councils. He trusted the Home Office would carefully consider the recommendations of the Departmental Committee and endeavour to carry them out. Another point was that wherever there was a ship there should always be a playground on shore. These, however, were matters of detail. The main question was the use of the ships for the benefit of the country; as it was, the country's money was now being expended uselessly. It was the duty of statesmen to face this question of the diminution in their sea power, and in the manning of their Mercantile Marine. There were the men to their hand, and they ought to make the best use of them. This was a question which would not brook delay, for they were going from bad to worse. He hoped, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would give the matter his most earnest consideration.

Sir C. CAMERON, having been the Chairman of a Departmental Committee which a few years ago had among its duties to examine into the question of juvenile delinquents and reformatory and industrial schools in Scotland, desired to say a few words on some reforms which did not involve legislation, and which might be carried through with advantage. He quite agreed with the gallant Admiral that it was a great pity boys educated in training ships should in such very small proportions find their way into the Navy. He remembered being very much struck by the fact, as shown before the Committee, that only a small proportion went to sea at all, and those who did went not in British, but generally, by preference, in Swedish vessels, the explanation given being that the Masters of the Swedish vessels treated them better and looked more carefully after them than the Masters of English ships. Everything should be done that was possible to provide from these training ships, for which the nation had to pay, a supply of sailors for our Mercantile Marine. The Departmental Committee to which he referred made a number of recommendations, some of which were purely matters of administration, and one or two of which would, at all events, recommend themselves on their very face to the common sense of the Home Secretary. The members of the Committee on visiting the prisons were very much struck by the fact that a large number of the prisoners had formerly been inmates of reformatory and industrial schools. They found that there was a much larger proportion of ex-reformatory boys and girls than ex-industrial school boys and girls. The members of the Committee had a number of conversations with these ex-reformatory pupils to find out how it was that so many of them lapsed into their old habits of crime. One cause was described in a paragraph of the Report of the Committee, which set forth that many of the ex-reformatory pupils stated that when they returned to their native towns after discharge they got among old companions, that youths so discharged, though not personally known, were recognised as coming from a reformatory by the clothes they wore and were so introduced into the set. The paragraph also stated that, while so much money was expended on reformatories it was folly to permit the work to be neutralised to a great extent for the sake of petty economies. No trouble or expense should be spared to remove youths from reformatories from their old associations or criminal surroundings. Many of the reformatories had a large web of cloth; each boy, on leaving, was given a suit of clothes made from this web, and when he went back to his native town all the other boys from the reformatory recognised him, so that he was at once drawn into a set of reformatory boys and drifted back into crime. This was a matter (said the hon. Member) which could easily be put an end to. A letter from the Home Office pointing out the evil results of such a practice would suffice to put an end to it. There was another matter which applied specially to reformatory and industrial schools in Scotland, and that was that the education was not given according to the Scotch, but according to the English code. The result was that an ex-reformatory or industrial school pupil, the moment he opened his mouth on any subject connected with his school life, was ever marked as having come from one of these institutions. That was most undesirable. What was wanted was to cut such a youth adrift from his old associations, to free him from all criminal companions, and give him such a fresh start in life as would insure him becoming an honest member of society in future. But that was not all. The Committee found in the Girls' Industrial School at Dundee a number of girls going through the fifth English standard. About half had already passed once in that standard; a quarter had passed twice and were going up a third time; while one girl had passed it three times and was going up a fourth. If the education was conducted under the Scotch code the pupils could go on to higher standards, and in the case, especially, of industrial school children, who were constantly transferred to Board Schools, a source of dislocation in their educational career would be avoided, and general convenience would be consulted if the system of education pursued in the industrial and reformatory schools were made conformable with that which was carried on throughout the country. He thought the time the children were kept in industrial schools might with advantage be shortened, and the money more advantageously expended in sending them into some other districts of the country, or to Colonies where they would get into a totally fresh community and where nothing of their past could be raked up against them. He thought, if the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider the matter, he would see that it was absurd to send children from the reformatories earmarked by their clothes, and by the system of education which was different to that generally carried on throughout the country, and that he would bring about a change in these respects.

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY agreed that in order to secure the future of those who had been sent to reformatories it was essential that they should not be earmarked with the reformatory stamp, and he certainly regretted that there should be any establishment in the United Kingdom which sent out any of its inmates in the manner the hon. Baronet had described. He had always understood that a young fellow who had served his time in a reformatory was supplied with clothing which could not identify him as belonging to any establishment which could in the remotest way be called penal. With reference to the question of teaching according to the Scotch Code, the hon. Member was probably aware that arrangements were now in progress whereby the inspection of Scotch reformatory and industrial schools would in future be under the responsibility of the Secretary for Scotland, who was naturally more acquainted with Scotch habits and wishes than an unfortunate Saxon like himself. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] He hoped that might possibly meet the difficulty as to the teaching arrangements to which the hon. Baronet had referred. ["Hear, hear!"] His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Eastbourne had several times called attention to the training ships of this country, and he had, with some reason, felt himself justified in saying that these training ships were not recruiting the Mercantile Marine in the manner he desired to see that service recruited. He was afraid that, though they might send boys to these training ships, they could not make them go to sea. He did not know how that could be cured. He had endeavoured to read the whole of the voluminous Report referred to by his hon. and gallant Friend, and he would use his best efforts to give effect to the recommendations which were made. The question of these reformatory industrial schools had been considered by a Committee appointed by his predecessor more than a year ago, but it was extremely difficult to arrive at any tangible result from their long deliberations. Therefore he did not think it could be expected that, either on the general question or on the particular question his hon. and gallant Friend desired to bring before the Committee, he should give a definite opinion that night. But he could promise him that he should give his best attention to the subject, and he should be glad to welcome any practical suggestion he had to make. He believed very much in the possible utility of these training ships under proper management, and any suggestion which tended to make them better and more adequate for their purpose would certainly receive the attention of the Home Office.

Admiral FIELD thanked the Home Secretary for his sympathetic reply, but reminded the right hon. Gentleman that his special point was that magistrates should not commit to the ships, and then they would only have volunteers from the land schools going to the ships because they wanted to go to sea. Let magistrates commit to land schools, and the question would solve itself.

10. £21,954, to complete the sum for Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum.—Agreed to.

11. £62,630, to complete the sum for Law Charges and Courts of Law, Scotland.—Agreed to.

12. £28,961, to complete the sum for Register House, Edinburgh.—Agreed to.

13. £3,350, to complete the sum for Crofters' Commission.—Agreed to.

14. £52,277, to complete the sum for Prisons, Scotland.

Mr. R. WALLACE (Perth) asked for some information as to the policy of the Prison Commissioners with regard to the general prison at Perth. That prison was built to accommodate nearly 1,000 prisoners, but at present it was practically empty. They would all rejoice if the prison were empty owing to the diminution of the criminal class in Scotland, but unfortunately that was not the case. The prison was empty as the result of a new system which had been inaugurated by the Prison Commissioners of Scotland. Until very recently long-sentence prisoners from every part of Scotland were conveyed to the prison at Perth, which was specially arranged for their accommodation. He thought that several hundred thousand pounds were spent in its construction, and yet at the present time it was practically empty, and was only used as a local house of detention. It was suggested that the new system was inaugurated from motives of economy in order to save the railway fares of prisoners from different parts of Scotland to Perth. But about two years ago, when the prison was made use of, the annual cost of bringing the prisoners to Perth was only £400. Therefore the economy which had been inaugurated by the Prison Commissioners of Scotland was, that in order to save £400 a year they had spent within the last two years a capital sum of £100,000 in the construction of a prison at Barlinnie, near Glasgow, and £20,000 to add to the accommodation of the prison at Dundee. He did not oppose this Vote in any hostile sense. He was only anxious to obtain from the Lord Advocate some information as to what the Prison Commissioners proposed in the end to do—whether they intended to practically abolish the Perth prison, or whether it was intended to return to the system recommended in past times of using it as a long-sentence prison.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he thought the facts of this case, which he was glad his hon. Friend had brought forward, required some explanation on the part of the Scotch Office. He thought many of the best authorities on prisons had entirely gone against the concentration of a large number of prisoners under one roof. The idea was rather to have a small number of prisons, where the prisoners could be kept under the immediate eye and study of the governor and the chaplain, and under the immediate supervision of the medical officer. He understood that this prison at Barlinnie was not only too large, but was also very insufficiently staffed. He thought they naturally expected the Lord Advocate to give them some reason for this policy of abandoning small prisons, well staffed and well equipped, and of concentrating and huddling the whole criminal population, practically, of Scotland, in this one great prison at Glasgow. He also desired to draw attention to a special grievance experienced by the chaplains and medical officers of prisons in Scotland. The Scotch medical officer and the Scotch chaplain got practically about £100 a year less than his English brethren. Was it because Scotch prisoners were more impressionable to religious influences and had a hardier constitution than English prisoners? One or two very important explanations had been offered by English Members on the Treasury Bench. He hoped the answer of the able Scotchman now in charge of Scotch prisons would be more satisfactory.

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire) said the hon. Member for Perth was under a misapprehension if he thought that the general policy as to prisons in Scotland was a matter of modern development. As he was aware, the general policy as to prisons took a new departure in 1877, when the prisons, which before that time had been maintained out of local resources, were taken over by the State. A general scheme was formulated by the Prison Commissioners in 1877. That was modified in 1880, and practically the scheme of 1880 —with this exception, that a certain prison proposed to be built in the neighbourhood of St. Boswells was given up—was really and practically the scheme in force now. Consequently the idea of the prison of Barlinnie was not a new idea, but part of the policy started in 1880. It was perfectly true that Perth prison was very much less occupied than it used to be, but that was owing not to any change of policy inimical to Perth, but owing to the operation of certain natural results. In the first place the idea was that it was very much better, if possible, to confine prisoners who were committed for short sentences in the district in which they were committed. That avoided taking prisoners a distance in the charge of warders and making them a spectacle at railway stations. In the next place the old idea of working out penal servitude was to submit a man first to a long period of solitary confinement and then to send him to work. That system had been given up and the prisoners were now sent to work at once. He believed that was very much better for the individual than the old system. The result of that had been against Perth. Originally convicts in Scotland were sent to England, but it was found that that was not a good arrangement, and accordingly the convict prison at Peterhead was instituted. Then, when this difference of treatment ensued, it was not possible to have convicts at Perth, because there was no work for them to do. Hon. Members who knew the surroundings of Perth prison knew that they could not employ gangs of convicts there. A third cause was the decrease in the number of female convicts. Perth had always been a female convict prison. In 1872 there were 320 female convicts in Perth; at the present moment there were only 15. He thought that was a figure on which they might entirely congratulate themselves. He had said the depletion of Perth prison was owing to natural causes, but there had been certain salutary reforms in the prisons. The reason why a certain amount of money had been spent on Dundee prison was really on the same lines. Most of the prisoners convicted in Dundee were prisoners with short sentences. There had been certain salutary reforms made in the prison of Dundee which resulted in a diminution of the cell accommodation, and what had been done in Dundee was really no more than to bring up the cell accommodation to something like what it was before, and avoid the necessity of taking prisoners on short sentences from Dundee to Perth. Even as it was there was scarcely sufficient room in Dundee, because he believed the average number of prisoners was really above the number of cells. As regarded the future, there was no new prison policy, so far as he knew. There was no intention at the present moment to give up Perth as a prison. At the same time, it was quite evident there might be causes and occasions where some use might be found for a large building of that sort, and then it would be a very fair matter for consideration, whether even Perth prisoners might not be accommodated elsewhere. But he did not think that would be likely, unless there was some particular occasion for utilising Perth prison in another way. With regard to the pay of the Chaplain and medical officers, he apprehended that it was the old question of demand and supply, and, although he was anxious not to be less patriotic than the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire, he felt it was for very much the same reason that his hon. and learned Friend sitting next him (Sir R. Finlay) got a better salary than he received; not because he was conscious of any superiority—[laughter]—but because Englishmen were inclined to give more money to a compatriot of his own when he came to the English Bar, and, therefore, it was only fair to remunerate him at a higher rate than was paid to Scotch officials. The present scale paid by the Treasury roughly corresponded with what a man could make at other similar work in the same country, and there was no great injustice to the chaplains and medical officers when their pay was compared with what they would get in ordinary civil employment.

PLUMBERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.) moved the Second Reading of this Bill.

MR. T. P. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) objected to the Bill as creating something approaching a monopoly, and as calculated to mislead the public. To impose fees upon persons before they were allowed to enter a trade, was to form an organisation similar to that which ruled in the profession of the lawyers, and was particularly objectionable in the case of trades. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent employers employing unfit workmen, and it was there the danger came in. Apart from these considerations, he submitted that the health of the public was better looked after by surveyors and sanitary inspectors; the creation of registered plumbers was to arouse a false sense of security.

*MR. LEES KNOWLES stated that the Bill had been before Parliament for many years. It was introduced in 1891, and was read a Second time in two Parliaments. A Select Committee had reported unanimously in favour of the principle of the Bill. The Bill had been referred to the Grand Committee on Trade, and certain parts of the Bill had been adopted in consequence of recommendations of the Grand Committee. It had been supported by upwards of 50 public bodies in the country, and it was only by bad luck that it had not been passed through the House long ago. The object of the Bill was explained in a memorandum attached to it. The chief aim was to afford additional safeguards to public health by enabling persons to select workmen who had given evidence of their qualification for plumber work. The Bill did not in any way contemplate a monopoly, and it did not interfere with the rights of non-registered plumbers; it only prevented them from representing themselves to be registered. The attempt was being made to divide competent from incompetent workmen, and the Bill simply gave a guarantee of efficiency. It was supported in all quarters of the House as well as in the country.

Dr. FARQUHARSON said it was not fair to say this was an antiquated class of legislation. All they wished to secure was that plumbers should pass through a course of study and examination, so as to place a cachet of superiority on their craft and give the public the general power of escaping from bad plumbing work. He supported the Bill in the interest of public health.

Bill Read a Second time.

On the Question, "That the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade, Etc."

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid) asked whether the Motion had the assent of the Government. One year this Bill was sent to the Standing Committee on Trade, and after considering it for some time, the Committee said it was so wretchedly bad that they sent it back to the House.

The SECRETARY to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. Russell, Tyrone, S.) said the Bill involved no Party consideration. It was just that class of Bill which ought to be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade. The Bill had been remodelled since 1894; it was not the same Bill which had been sent back, and he thought the House would do well to accept it.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, Etc.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday 3rd June.

RATING (PLACES OF WORSHIP AND SCHOOLS) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday 1st June.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1894) AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.), who rose to move the Second Reading of this Bill, said that it had been introduced to remedy certain minor administrative defects in the Act of 1894. By Clause 2 of the Bill it was intended to save the time of Parish and District Councils by removing the necessity for recording the names on all divisions unless a substantial minority desired it. The next clause enabled a Parish Council to be dissolved at any time on the petition of the parish meeting, where there were less than 300 inhabitants, or 50 electors in the parish. Clause 4 dispensed with the necessity for an audit of parish accounts, where there had been no receipts or expenditure within the year. Clause 5 did away with the anomaly which prevented persons chosen as additional guardians from taking part in sanitary and highway works, where the Poor Law and District Council areas were identical. Clause 6 settled a doubt that had arisen as to the status of a Rural District Councillor who had ceased to be a Guardian.

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

The House was Adjourned at Twenty-five Minutes before Eleven of the Clock till Monday next.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (LORD BALFOUR) in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that their Lordships would have no difficulty in passing the Second Reading, as the Bill was substantially that which passed through the House of Lords last year. This year the Bill had been introduced in another place, where it had passed without Amendment. It was a Bill of only one operative clause, and its object was to enable the trustees of mineral properties to reduce mineral royalties and accept the renunciation of leases. The Act which the Bill proposed to amend already gave to the trustees of agricultural estates the power to give reductions of rent. On some mineral estates, especially in the west of Scotland, the minerals could not be worked at the present royalties, owing to the depression of trade and other circumstances. He begged to move.

Read 2ª, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

House Adjourned at Twenty-five Minutes before Five o'Clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter past Four o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

QUESTIONS.

HOLY TRINITY CHURCH SCHOOL, GRAY'S INN ROAD.

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Thirsk, as a Charity Commissioner (1) whether the attention of the Charity Commissioners has been called to the case of Holy Trinity Church of England School, Gray's Inn Road (which received a building grant of £531 2s. 9d.), which was formally transferred to the School Board for London, and is now mainly let to a trading company; and (2) whether the Charity Commissioners have taken any steps to secure that the rent derived from letting the building is applied to the trusts to which the school premises are subject?

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. J. GRANT LAWSON, York, N.R., Thirsk and Malton): The Charity Commissioners find, upon inquiry, that the facts are as stated in the first clause of the Question. The rent derived from letting the school building, though wholly applied to public purposes, is not applied in accordance with the exclusively educational trusts to which the building is subject. The Commissioners are taking steps to insure compliance with the trusts in future.

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY.

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the inquiry held at the Mile End Vestry respecting the death of a lady travelling in an overcrowded carriage on the Great Eastern Railway on Easter Monday; and whether, in view of the coroner's remarks in regard to the danger arising from the overcrowding of railway carriages, he will consider the advisability of taking such steps as will enable the Board of Trade to deal with the question of overcrowding of carriages on the Great Eastern Railway?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): No, Sir; I do not propose to initiate legislation on the subject. I have, however, called the attention of the Company to the terms of the hon. Member's Question.

BEAM AND OTTER TRAWLING.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has yet decided to consult the States Signatories of the North Sea Convention with a view to rendering beam and otter trawling illegal within 13 miles of the Coast of Scotland?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): No, Sir; the Government have not yet decided.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state the number of withdrawals from the Post Office Savings Bank for the year ending 31st December, 1896, and what percentage of that number consisted of transfers to third persons?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The exact number of withdrawals for the year 1896 cannot yet be given, as the accounts are not completely made up. The estimated number is 4,324,000. No separate account is kept of the number of warrants paid to third persons—which the hon. Member is presumed to mean when he speaks of "transfers"—but the number for the year 1896 is roughly estimated to be 25,000.

HERRING BRAND FEES.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state what sum out of the surplus of herring brand fees has been devoted, for the years 1894, 1895, and 1896 respectively, for payments under guarantee to the Post Office for the extension of telegraphic communication to certain districts interested in the herring fisheries?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The amount of surplus herring brand fees devoted to the payment of telegraph guarantees in 1894, 1895, and 1896 respectively was: £925 7s. 3d., £966 0s. 11d., and £290 17s. 1d.

MUSSEL BEDS.

MR. J. W. CROMBIE (Kincardine): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, now that the Schedule of Mussel Beds has been laid upon the Table of the House, Her Majesty's Government have determined what steps they will take in the direction of legislation on this subject?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: No district Fishery Committee has yet been constituted under the Act of 1895, and until localities interested in mussel cultivation form Committees the Fishery Board can only encourage such cultivation by undertaking it themselves or protecting private enterprise. With this view the Board are negotiating with the Board of Trade for a lease of the Clyde Mussel Beds, and Her Majesty's Government propose to await the result.

AUXILIARY POSTMEN (SUNDAY DUTY).

MR. G. LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any new rules have been formulated by the Post Office for increasing the rate of pay for the Sunday duty of rural auxiliary postmen; and, if so, whether any such increase of pay has been granted?

*MR. HANBURY: The question of increasing the rates of pay for the Sunday duty of rural auxiliary postmen is now under consideration, and instructions will shortly be issued.

DOG MUZZLING.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when the Order for the muzzling of dogs will be extended over the whole country; whether any particular pattern of wire muzzle is obligatory; whether the regulation as to the quarantine of dogs at the ports has yet been issued; and what time must elapse after all the necessary precautions have been enforced before the muzzling Orders can be altogether withdrawn?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. WALTER LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): It is not proposed to apply muzzling Orders to the whole country, but only to areas in which rabies undoubtedly exists or to which there is reason to fear that it may have been conveyed. A series of Orders for this purpose will be issued in the course of the next few days. No particular pattern of wire muzzle is compulsory, but, with a view to assist dog owners in the selection of a muzzle, specimens of a muzzle which we believe to be both efficient and humane, will be deposited at the principal police stations in districts to which muzzling Orders are applied. An Order regulating the importation of dogs will be issued almost immediately. It would be premature for me to forecast the time during which it will be necessary for muzzling Orders to be kept in force. Rabies is unfortunately a disease which may lie dormant for a considerable period after an animal has been bitten, and much will depend upon the support we receive from local authorities and dog owners generally in our efforts to stamp out the disease in this country.

MR. LOUGH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman a question which has been sent to me by a correspondent, arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman? [Laughter.] It is whether a dog must have a muzzle on in taking his morning bath in a pond on Peckham Rye. [Laughter.]

*MR. LONG: The correspondent of the hon. Gentleman appears to be possessed of the power of divination. ["Hear!" and laughter.] That being so, I should think that he could have answered his own question. ["Hear!" and laughter.] The question depends upon the place where the dog takes his morning bath.

MR. LOUGH: The right hon. Gentleman is in error. I particularly mentioned Peckham Rye as the place.

*MR. LONG: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not hear him mention Peckham Rye. But the hon. Member did not say whether the pond was in public or private grounds.

MR. LOUGH: It is in public grounds.

*MR. LONG: Then the dog must wear his muzzle. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

POST OFFICE EXTENSIONS (SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the people of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland experience great difficulty in providing guarantees for telegraph extensions when, under Treasury Rules, it becomes the duty of the Post Office to demand such guarantees; and whether he will endeavour to induce the Treasury to relax the rules in regard to telegraph extensions so far, at least, as the Highlands and Islands of Scotland are concerned?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware that in some parts of the Highlands and Islands of Scotland the people have experienced great difficulty in providing guarantees for telegraph extensions, and he hopes that this difficulty will be removed by the alteration in the system of guarantees which was announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in connection with the Budget.

BOTTLING BEER.

MR. REGINALD McKENNA (Monmouth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the folding of newspapers is, like the bottling of beer, such a process as to constitute any premises in which the same is carried on a factory or workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshops Acts 1878 to 1895?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The Question in both cases turns, I think, on whether the process has for its main object the adaptation of the article for sale or its more convenient conveyance.

The bottling of beer has been considered to have as its object the first of these alternatives; the folding of newspapers the second. The place, consequently, where the latter occupation is carried on is not held to be within the Acts. The point is by no means clear, but I do not see my way to altering the policy of my predecessors.

JUVENILE PRISONERS.

Mr. J. M. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Prison Commissioners have lately had under consideration the treatment of juvenile prisoners awaiting trial or on remand; and whether he can state what modifications, if any, in the existing practice have been or are likely to be made in this regard?

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Yes, Sir; the Prison Commissioners have been considering this matter, and an experiment is now being tried at Holloway by which the ordinary discipline for unconvicted prisoners is mitigated in the case of those that are under 16. The modifications are, briefly, that the cell doors are left open, under, of course, proper supervision; more time is allowed for exercise, and the exercise itself is more varied; special arrangements are also made for their instruction and generally for giving them occupation. I hope that it will be found possible very shortly to extend these modifications to other prisons also; at all events, the experience that will be gained will be valuable in framing rules for dealing generally with the matter.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Mr. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will favourably entertain the suggestion that a certain number of seats on the space in front of the National Gallery, or some other suitable site, be reserved for the official representatives of the Colonies and such Members of the Colonial Legislatures as may desire to witness the Jubilee procession?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): Arrangements have already been made for allotting a certain number of seats to representatives of the Colonies, and the Colonial Office will arrange for their distribution.

Captain BAGOT (Westmoreland, Kendal): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether any, and if so what, regiments of Indian Native Infantry are going to be represented on the occasion of the celebration of the 60th year of Her Majesty's reign?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): On the occasion of the Jubilee in 1887 it was decided that the Indian Army as a whole should be represented by 13 officers of Native Cavalry, and it is proposed on the present occasion to follow that precedent, but to increase the number from 13 to 22. To these will be added 18 native officers representing the Imperial Service troops, which are maintained by the native States for service with the regular army in time of war. Any proposal to bring home a selection of native infantry soldiers, and at the same time to keep the numbers of the representative detachment within reasonable bounds, was held in 1887, and is held now, to be attended by almost insuperable difficulties. These difficulties I much regret, for I should have been glad to have been able to give prominence at Her Majesty's Jubilee to the Native Infantry, who have on so many occasions done such splendid service for the Empire.

PACIFIC CABLE COMMISSION.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to make a statement in reference to the recommendations of the Pacific Cable Commission?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the COLONIES (Mr. J. Chamberlain, Birmingham, W.): The answer to the hon. Member's Question is in the negative.

POST OFFICE (THURLES, CO. TIPPERARY).

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any progress has been made in the matter of providing the important town of Thurles, County Tipperary, with improved accommodation for the transaction of postal and telegraphic business?

*Mr. HANBURY: The plans referred to in my reply to the hon. Gentleman's Question on the 22nd of March have not yet been received, but efforts are being made to obtain them. Another scheme for obtaining a new office has just been suggested, and inquiries are now being made regarding it.

CHANNEL PASSENGER SERVICE (CUSTOMS EXAMINATION).

Mr. IAN MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the widespread discontent which exists owing to the inconvenience experienced by passengers travelling from Calais to Dover by the night boat, owing to the fact that under recent regulations registered luggage is now examined on the boat at Dover Quay with insufficient light, inadequate accommodation, and a total absence of porters to open or close the baggage; and whether, having regard to the confusion which nightly occurs, he would direct the Customs authorities at Dover to conduct such examination either at Dover Station or at the London terminus?

*Mr. HANBURY: I understand that the system now in force of examining the luggage on the boat while the mails are being landed, instead of in London, was adopted at the suggestion of the railway Company. It saves the passengers from being detained for a quarter of an hour or 20 minutes at 5.40 a.m. at the London terminus, and the Customs officers there from having to wait up all night. The inconvenience to which the hon. Member alludes probably occurred on the morning of April 21, when the steamboat Company had not made proper arrangements to meet the return of the Easter holiday passengers. The Company has given an assurance that proper precautions shall be taken in future. It may, however, be necessary at holiday times, when there is a great rush by the night steamer, to arrange the examination in London. To examine the luggage at Dover Station would involve turning the passengers out of the train there and delaying them for an indefinite period. There is no accommodation for such examination on the Admiralty Pier, and if the present system were abandoned, the only alternative would be to keep them waiting at the London terminus as under the old system, which, I am informed, is a much less popular arrangement.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) asked whether it was the fact that other railway companies bringing passengers from Paris to London provided for the examination of the luggage in London with satisfactory results?

*Mr. HANBURY: I am informed that it is the fact that the other railway companies do provide for the examination of their passengers' luggage in London, but I am told that the arrangements are not satisfactory.

POSTAL DELIVERY (GRANGE, YOUGHAL).

Mr. J. J. SHEE (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether a memorial has been recently received from a number of the inhabitants of Grange sub-post-office, near Youghal, as to the want of a postal delivery through the district; whether many persons have to come or send six miles daily for their letters; and what steps the Postmaster General intends to take to afford increased postal facilities to the large and populous area concerned?

*Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has had under consideration the memorial from Grange referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, and although the circumstances do not admit of a daily delivery to the houses in question, he has had much pleasure in sanctioning an arrangement under which the letters will be delivered four days a week.

BARBED WIRE FENCES.

Mr. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if barbed wire fences are permissible along the sides of public roads; what county official is responsible in cases where such wires are allowed to be put up and maintained; and will he direct prosecutions should any such cases be brought to his notice?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): Barbed wire, if placed along a public road, is not permissible if it amounts to a nuisance. The county surveyor of a county, or city engineer, or surveyor of a borough, is, under the Act of 1893, the person empowered to take action against those responsible for placing the wire there. The Executive have no authority in the matter.

GENERAL POST OFFICE (LONDON).

Mr. CROMBIE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is true that the Post Office intends taking as a site for a new post office the Vicarage, Christ Church, Newgate Street; and whether, in view of the impracticability of finding any other site for a Vicarage within the parish, the Post Office can make any other arrangement for a site?

*Mr. HANBURY: The House used as the Vicarage for the Parish of Christ Church, Newgate Street, is provisionally scheduled amongst the properties to be taken under the powers of the Post Office Sites Bill, which is about to be introduced into Parliament, but it has not yet been definitely decided that, in the event of the Bill being passed, steps shall be taken to proceed with the acquisition of the premises. In any case, the Department would be desirous of meeting the convenience of the parish as far as possible.

HOUSEHOLD CAVALRY EXERCISES.

Mr. F. A. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that that part of Rotten Row opposite to Knightsbridge Barracks, and intended for the public to ride on, is used by the Household Cavalry for practising military exercises, and that the riding track is at times consequently blocked up by hurdles erected for the purpose of affording jumps; whether until this year the Household Cavalry quartered at Knightsbridge Barracks had the privilege of using the grass in front of the barracks for this purpose; will he explain why this privilege has recently been taken away, with the result that the regiment of Household Cavalry quartered at Knightsbridge Barracks has nowhere to practise these exercises except in the barrack square, where it is impossible to practise except under dangerous conditions, owing to inadequacy of space; whether he is aware that the performance of these exercises in that part of the park allotted to riding is a matter of danger to the public, owing to its proximity to the carriage road; and whether he will give orders that their ancient privilege of practising exercises on the grass may be restored to the Household Cavalry, so that there may be no necessity in future for taking part of the riding track for that purpose, and thereby preventing at certain times of the day its use and enjoyment by the public?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS: Permission has never been given, so far as I am aware, for hurdle-jumping and tent-pegging on the grass in front of the Hyde Park barracks, although such exercises may have been carried out there. In the opinion of the authorities best qualified to judge, the grass would be very rapidly destroyed were this practice to be allowed, and the Ranger has therefore permitted the Household Cavalry to use the ride for these purposes up to 7 a.m. I will, however, consult with the Ranger upon the point raised by my hon. Friend with a view to seeing whether the experiment can be tried of permitting the grass plot in question to be used, if required, after 7 a.m.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether, as the cavalry only used the Park for a few days in the year, it was not possible to allow the exercises to take place on the grass?

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the exercises had always been carried out on the grass?

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS thought that last year, or the year before, the exercises were stopped in order to save the grass. He agreed that there was no reason why they should not be continued, subject to the general convenience of the public.

TURCO-GREEK WAR.

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received any suggestion from the German Government for the punishment of Greece, or the forcing of Crete back into subjection to the Turkish Government; if so, whether he will lay the Dispatch referring to these proposals upon the Table of the House forthwith; and whether Her Majesty's Government will pledge themselves to take steps to frustrate the carrying out of any such proposals?

MR. CURZON: No such suggestion has been received, and there is no necessity for Her Majesty's Government to pledge themselves to frustrate a proposal which no one is likely to make, and which the hon. Member must excuse me for saying it is ridiculous to suggest. [Laughter.]

TRANSVAAL (VAAL DRIFTS).

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Papers with reference to the dispute with the Transvaal Government in regard to the closing of the drifts on the Vaal River, which are to be presented to the Cape Parliament?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I answered the same Question a few days ago. I believe it is intended to present these Papers to the Cape Parliament. If they are presented to the Cape Parliament, I shall lay them on the Table here.

SEWAGE (COVENTRY).

MR. CHARLES MURRAY (Coventry): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the long continued and dangerous delay, from various causes, attending the settlement of the sewage question in Coventry, an injunction against the Corporation being only temporarily suspended; and whether the Local Government Board will at once announce their decision upon the unopposed scheme of the Corporation, which was inquired into on the 19th of March last?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Local Government Board have received the Report of their Inspector on the Inquiry, and the Report has been under their consideration with regard to certain points in connection with the scheme. The decision of the Board in the case will be given very shortly.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Postmaster General's attention has been called to the request for a daily mail service from Derinacahara (Dunmanway, County Cork) to Coolmountain, the present delivery being only three times weekly; and if the request submitted will be complied with?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General's attention does not appear to have been called to the desire for a daily post from Derinacahara to Coolmountain in lieu of the present service three days a week, but the matter shall be inquired into.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the communication that was promised to be made by the Postmaster General in favour of facilitating the acceleration of the mails in the Donoughmore district, Blarney, County Cork, has been made, and with what results; and whether, in view of the fact that widespread dissatisfaction with the existing system is expressed, a speedy reform may be made, the new light railway being utilised for the purpose?

*MR. HANBURY: Figures have been obtained in regard to the posts in the Donoughmore district, which show that no improvement of delivery at Donoughmore in the morning, or of dispatch in the afternoon, would result from the substitution of a service by railway for the existing service by road. There was a further question whether a second delivery in the day might not be afforded by means of the railway, but the number of letters that would fall into a second delivery is found to be far from sufficient to warrant the necessary cost attending the additional service.

STEAMSHIP "DARWIN."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that six firemen, who joined the steamship Darwin at Glasgow on 26th October, 1896, and proceeded on a voyage to Buenos Ayres, were charged by the captain with not maintaining a sufficient quantity of steam; that when the vessel arrived at Rosario the firemen were taken before H.B.M. Consul, who refused to interfere as he believed the men were doing their best; and whether he is aware that when the vessel arrived at Buenos Ayres the captain again took the firemen before H.B.M. Consul General at that port, who ordered the men to go back to their ship, which they did; and whether, shortly afterward, six policemen went on board, arrested the six firemen, and took them to a prison, where they were incarcerated for 17 days without a trial of any kind having been held; and whether it is true that the men were employed working without pay for the Harbour Authorities, and confined at nights in filthy cells; and whether he can state if H.B.M.'s Consuls abroad have power to imprison British seamen without trial before a Naval Court; and, if not, whether he will take steps to call upon the Consul at Buenos Ayres to explain his conduct in this matter?

Mr. RITCHIE: I find that the attention of the Board of Trade has already been called by the hon. Member himself to the case referred to at such length in the Question. The Consul at Buenos Ayres has been requested to report fully upon all the circumstances; and, so soon as his report is received, a communication shall be sent to the hon. Member.

CROFTERS' COMMISSION (REPORT).

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the forthcoming Report of the Crofters' Commission, though laid upon the Table on the 26th instant, and not yet issued to Members of this House, has been available to certain members of the Press for several days; and if he will state the source from which the Report has been obtained, and when it will be issued to Members?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: The printing of the copies necessary for circulation has taken some time, but I understand will be completed shortly. As the hon. Member is aware, the Report is available to Members in the Library, and its contents are thus communicable to the Press or others.

Mr. Havelock Wilson.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. LAMBERT asked when the Government proposed to take the Necessitous Board Schools Bill?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I am afraid I cannot give a definite answer. I should like the hon. Member to put down the Question for to-morrow. I do not think that the Committee stage will be a long stage.

WALLACE BEQUEST.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is now able to state to the House the probable arrangements for the housing of the Wallace Bequest; whether there is anything in the terms of the Will preventing the Art treasures in Hertford House being allowed to remain there permanently; and whether, in the event of the Government deciding to remove them to Trafalgar Square, consideration will be given to the urgent need for extension of the National Gallery buildings, so as to secure the proper display of the pictures which they contain?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: In answer to the hon. Member I have to say that a Committee has been appointed to inquire into and report on the whole subject in connection with the Wallace Bequest The terms of the reference are as follows:—

> "Where, in what manner, and at what probable cost, provision may be best made for housing and exhibiting the art collection recently bequeathed to the nation by Lady Wallace, and to make any recommendations which may seem fit to them as to the constitution of a Trust in which this collection may be vested."

The members of the Committee are:—

Lord Lansdowne (Chairman)
Sir William Harcourt
Sir Edward Poynter
Mr. Freeman Mitford
Sir F. Mowatt
Mr. Walter Armstrong, Director of the National Gallery of Ireland
Mr. Alfred de Rothschild and
Mr. Alfred Waterhouse.

Dr. FARQUHARSON asked whether the Hertford collection would be open to the public during the time it remained at Hertford House?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I should think it will be impossible to open the collection until the arrangements have been made for its public exhibition.

FOREIGN CODES OF LAW.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that a department of the French Government, namely, le Ministère de la Justice, is publishing at the public charge a series of French translations of the principal Foreign Codes of Law; and whether, following the precedent of the State Trials Committee, the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury would be disposed favourably to regard a proposal for the appointment of a Committee charged with the duty of superintending the preparation of English translations of famous Foreign Codes, such as the Penal Code of Italy, 1890?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I will consult the Home Secretary on the subject of this Question; but my own impression is that it will be better, at all events, to wait and see what is the result of the French translation of the Codes, and what value it is to students. It may well be that the Italian Code is more available for English students than the French translation.

POLICE APPOINTMENT AND PROMOTION BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Tomorrow till Tuesday 11th May.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WORKMEN (COMPENSATION FOR ACCIDENTS) BILL.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool), in asking for leave to introduce "a Bill to amend the law with respect to compensation to workmen for accidental injuries suffered in the course of their employment," said: I do not think the House will expect me to attempt to enter into the history of this difficult and intricate question. I think those who remember the discussion that took place in 1893 will recall the fact that my predecessor gave on that occasion a most clear explanation of the state of the law and the attempts which had been made to alter it. Neither shall I endeavour to prove to the House that the Government is justified in dealing with this extremely difficult problem. Looking to the Debates of the last few years, and to all the controversies which have taken place with respect to labour questions throughout the country, there is, I think, sufficient justification for any Government trying to do their best to solve the problem. ["Hear, hear!"] I shall, therefore, assume, without further argument, that the question of compensation for accidents to workmen in some form or other is one with which Parliament ought to deal, and if I needed further argument I should say that the present advisers of Her Majesty are pledged to deal with it; and, in accordance with the promises made to the country, they believe it to be right and proper that they should introduce this Measure now. In 1893 my predecessor introduced a Bill whose object was, by making employers responsible for accidents which were due to their own negligence, or to the negligence of those employed by them, to give a strong incentive to the taking of proper precautions for securing safety in dangerous industries. I think that is not an unfair definition of the object which the right hon. Gentleman had in view. The effect of that Bill would, I think, have been to put the workman in the same position as the stranger. It would have restored the workman to the same rights under the common law which a stranger to the employer possesses, and which he enjoyed previous to the decision of the Law Courts that established the doctrine of common employment; that is to say, it would have given every workman in this country—and the definition of "workman" was wide and all-embracing—the same right of action which every stranger had. That right of action would have been for unlimited compensation. Against those proposals it was argued that it was unfair to make employers legally responsible when they were not morally responsible, and it was said that they could not be morally responsible for these accidents when they had no power over the persons who had caused the accidents and who were not under their control. It was said, further, that those proposals did not remove the difficulty of proving negligence, and those who are familiar with the character of these accidents will, I think, be prepared to admit that one of the great difficulties which have attended this subject in its practical operation is the difficulty of proving negligence. Therefore it was argued that the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, instead of doing anything in the direction of diminishing the chances of litigation, would work in the opposite direction, and that the result of putting such a large and onerous liability upon the employers of this country would be that they would inevitably use every endeavour to litigate themselves out of such liability. Further, there was the difficulty of contributory negligence, and a subject that is more likely to lead to litigation and to excite the activity of lawyers can hardly be imagined. Another argument that was used with great force against the proposals of my right hon. Friend was that they would not extend to the vast majority of the accidents which, unfortunately, occur in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] It was felt that, although the workmen and those who represent them say that they do not so much desire compensation or payment for loss of life or limb as they desire protection, it was reasonable that there should be some attempt on the part of the Legislature of this country to meet these accidents by some compensation. ["Hear, hear!"] I shall not endeavour to fix the number of the accidents which were altogether omitted from the operation of my right hon. Friend's proposals. They have been variously estimated, but never at less than 40 or 50 per cent., and my right hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, who is responsible for a Bill based on the principle of general compensation, put the number at 80 per cent. But, whatever the number may be, surely the subject ought to be taken into consideration by the House. ["Hear, hear!"] The principle of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite was accepted in this House by both sides, and also by the House of Lords, and if the Measure was ultimately wrecked after laborious progress through the Grand Committee, it was lost because the right hon. Gentleman and his friends refused to agree to the Amendment, which was inserted in another place, and which gave the power of contracting out, or, as I would prefer to put it, gave the power to employers and employed to contract themselves under proper safeguards into a better position. ["Hear, hear!"] When that Bill was before the House a very important Amendment was moved by my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for the Colonies, who proposed that it would be advantageous to provide for all accidents by making compensation a trade expense; but, if I remember rightly, that Amendment was not carried to a division. It was argued that the workman should not only be put into the same position as the stranger, but, if anything, into a better position. It was argued that the serious results of accidents could not be held to be adequately met by merely giving the workman a right of action in respect of the negligence of an employer or of any person for whom he was responsible, and it was felt that the workman or his representatives ought to have a right to compensation at the expense, not of the rates or of public charity, but of the industry in which he was engaged. When it was said that by imposing such a burden upon the industries of this country you would render competition with foreign trade still more difficult than it is at the present time, it was shown that such a law of industrial compensation is well-nigh common to the whole of the Continent, and is in force in most of those countries with which we enter into any severe competition. It was pointed out also that such a scheme, providing for general compensation, if it accurately defined the liabilities of one side and the other, and if it provided a simple and inexpensive remedy, would prevent litigation. It would prevent uncertainty, and the parties and their representatives would know what their rights were. Some words used by my right hon. Friend opposite seemed to indicate that he at any rate would be prepared to approve such a solution of this difficulty, but it was said by others, and the labour representatives principally, that such a law would lead to general insurance, and that insurance, if general, leads to diminished responsibility on the part of the owners, and must do away with those incentives to supplying adequate protection which the right hon. Gentleman opposite had in view when he introduced his Bill in 1893. I am prepared to agree to the fullest extent with those who argue that the Legislature can properly interfere to secure the safety of those engaged in dangerous industries; but, I ask, how far is the argument sound which says that if you have insurance you undermine safety? If you passed an Act of Parliament to-morrow prohibiting persons from insuring against risks, it would be impossible to carry the Measure into practical operation. Under the Bill of my right hon. Friend opposite the liability was unlimited, and the difficulties of insurance would therefore have been much greater and the premiums much higher than they would be under a scheme of limited liability. But the absolute certainty is that under any scheme of compensation there will and must be insurance. What is the effect of insurance? With regard to inevitable accidents it of course can make no difference, but how far does insurance affect preventable accidents? When an employer is his own insurer, surely his own interest demands that he should endeavour to diminish risk and to prevent accidents; and if the result of a scheme of insurance is to throw more business upon insurance societies, they, too, will have great reason to see that proper precautions are taken for safety, and if proper precautions are not taken the premiums will rise. Insurance companies will not deal on the same reasonable terms with employers who do not adopt proper precautions as they will with those who do their best to protect life in the industries in which they are engaged. It is, therefore, hardly conceivable that under a system of universal liability and insurance employers will not take every care to protect their workmen. But, after all, the true means of protection against the improper conduct of dangerous trades does not lie in civil liability, but in maintaining a proper criminal liability under the Acts which exist; and if those Acts are not sufficient and adequate for the purpose they should be strengthened. At all events, we have in this country many Acts which are expressly provided for the purpose of securing that, apart from any civil liabilities, the State should see—and it does see—through its inspectors that proper precautions are taken for the protection of life and limb by everybody who employs men in dangerous industries. Now, Sir, one word as to German experience. I dare say it will be said that there has been an increase of accidents under the German system, which is almost universal, and applies to almost all industries now; but I think it requires a somewhat close examination of the official figures to see what the effect really has been. So far as I am able to understand them, if there has been any increase of accidents under the system of general insurance, it appears to have been because there has been a much more accurate notification of accidents and a much closer record of what has happened in the various industries; and, secondly, there has been, in the case of serious accidents, particularly those causing death, instead of an increase, a decided decrease. That was, in short, the state of affairs on the one side and on the other when the Government came to consider this problem. It seemed to us that we had two alternatives before us—one the alternative of adopting something like the provision of my right hon. Friend opposite, adding to it, as we were pledged to do, the power of contracting out. [Cheers.] The other alternative we had was to propose a scheme of general compensation, under proper safeguards and necessary limitations, and apply it to industries to which it would appear, in the first instance, it could properly be applied. It will be gathered from what I have said to the House that in the proposals we are about to submit to Parliament we have chosen the latter course. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill we propose does not explicitly or directly deal at all with the Employers' Liability Act of 1880. It leaves that Act entirely untouched. It proceeds on the principle which I will venture to quote from the words used by my right hon. Friend in 1893, that—

> "when a person, on his own responsibility and for his own profit, sets in motion agencies which create risks for others, he ought to be civilly responsible for the consequences of what he does."

In our Bill we accept the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, and we accordingly propose in the first clause that—

> "if in any employment to which this Act applies, personal injury by accident, arising out of and in the course of employment, is caused to a workman, his employer shall be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first schedule of this Act."

The first schedule provides that when death results from the injury, if the workman leaves dependants, the amount of compensation shall be a sum equal to his earnings during the previous three years, or a sum of £150, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case £300, provided that any weekly payments made under the Act shall be deducted from such sum. And in case of incapacity for work, a weekly payment during incapacity, after the second week, not exceeding 50 per cent. of his weekly earnings at the time of the accident, such weekly payment not to exceed £1.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): What happens in the case of permanent incapacity?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The words are "during incapacity."

*SIR C. DILKE: It is larger than in death.

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I think the right hon. Baronet had better wait until he sees the Bill. I believe there would be no difference of opinion that, in adopting this principle, a limit should be adopted with it, and, on the whole, it is likely that the limit we propose is a safe and reasonable one. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill goes on to say that if the injury was caused by the wilful or wrongful act or default of the employer or some other person for whose act or default the employer was responsible, he should be liable to be sued under the old Act, but not liable to pay compensation both independently of and also under this Bill. Now I come to the question how these circumstances are to be determined. We propose that, if any question arises as to whether the employment is one to which this Act applies, or whether the injury is caused under the circumstances mentioned in the last clause of the Bill which I have read, or as to the liability for compensation under this Act or the amount or duration of the compensation, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule of this Act, be settled by arbitration in accordance with the second schedule. Our hope is, with regard to arbitration, that committees will be established between employers and men to settle the question; but, if there is no committee and the parties do not agree, the matter shall be settled by a suitable arbitrator appointed by the parties, or, in the absence of agreement, by the County Court Judge or by an arbitrator appointed in another way, but in that case we should not throw any of the costs on the parties. It is proposed that the Treasury should make regulations for the payment of the arbitrator. I come now to a clause in the Bill which, of course, I am aware is controversial, even if the others are not. It is no doubt more difficult to deal with the subject of contracting out when you offer to the workmen of this country a much more liberal scheme of compensation than was proposed in the Bill of my right hon. Friend; and it is, of course, more difficult in the circumstances to give that incentive either to employers or employed which has been the main motive that has originated those mutual societies we desire, so far as we can, to protect. At the same time I may say I have some reason to think that many of the objections entertained conscientiously by hon. Gentlemen opposite to the principle of contracting out will not be so formidable, and that the principle will not seem to them so injurious to the interests of the workmen when we have established the fact that the workman is entitled under the law to the privileges I have shortly indicated, and when we provide that in no circumstances whatever shall he be able to deprive himself of them. ["Hear, hear!"] We believe in the same principles which we asserted when in Opposition, the same line of argument which was pursued at the general election, the same pledges given by many Gentlemen on this side of the House with regard to freedom of contract. We believe it is better to provide by mutual agreement than by law. [Cheers.] We think that, if both parties can come to an agreement to settle their own differences or arrange their own wants in their own way, it is a more satisfactory way of doing it than the most liberal legislation Parliament can provide. Of course we cannot but be aware that in the principal enacting clause of this Bill we adopt the general principles of compensation—limited, it is true; but, when we have provided that, there are possibly not the same inducements to provide against accidents that there were under the Bill of my right hon. Friend. The adoption of that principle may involve some reconstruction of the existing societies, but we desire to give them room to provide further advantages of any kind it may be in their power to provide, and we propose a clause to the effect that, if the Registrar of Friendly Societies certifies that any scheme of compensation or insurance for workmen is, on the whole, not less favourable to the workman than the provisions of this Bill, the employer may, until the certificate is revoked, contract with any workman that the provisions of the scheme shall be substituted for the provisions of the Bill, and that the employer shall be liable only under the scheme. That clause is intended to provide a guarantee that, if any schemes of this kind are entered into or continued, they shall offer the same advantages to the workman as are offered by the Bill. Then there are other considerations which will come in to avoid litigation. I ought to have said, in reference to the schedule, that this Bill does not give any compensation for injuries which do not disable workmen for a period of two weeks. Now I come to the question as to what industries this Bill should apply to. From what I have said the House will realise that in our opinion it is not possible that the Bill can apply to all the industries of the country. We propose that the Bill shall apply to what I may call the more dangerous industries of the country, or, speaking roughly, to those industries for which Parliament has provided special protection. The words of the Bill are:—

> "This Act shall apply only to employment on, in, or about a railway, factory, mine, quarry, or engineering work."

The definition of railway follows the known definition of the Railway Act of 1871, and the definition of factory follows the Factory and Workshops Acts of 1878 to 1891, and it also includes—

> "any dock, wharf, quay, or warehouse to which any provision of the Factory Acts is applied by the Factory and Workshops Act of 1895."

MR. H. H. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): Does it include workshops?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, it does not include workshops. Mines, of course, are defined by the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887. Engineering work means—

> "any work of construction on a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer, and includes any building or other work on which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power is used for the purpose of the construction thereof."

MR. R. J. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): What include workshops?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: It means a large building in which dangerous work is done.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): Does it include seamen?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: It does not apply to seamen.

MR. S. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): Does it apply to domestic servants?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, certainly not. We do not propose any scheme of general insurance. ["Hear, hear!"] The House is probably familiar with the state of the law in Germany, Austria, and various other Continental countries; they know that in Germany, at all events, there is an extremely elaborate system, one which is utterly foreign to this country. ["Hear, hear!"] We believe that, as to a large number of the industries of this country, employers are, and will be, their own insurers. We believe that insurance has been a growing custom, and we believe that the obligation which will be thrown upon employers under this Bill will be adequately and efficiently met by insurance societies. The cost of management in Germany is one-fifth of the total compensation paid in respect of the total industries of the country, and one-tenth of the total compensation in the case of mines. That is a cost which we in this country could not face with equanimity. ["Hear, hear!"] It is most difficult to compute what will be the cost of insurance or the amount of liability upon the owners, and I shall, no doubt, be told that the burden which will be imposed upon the industries to which the Bill applies will be prohibitive. I do not think so. I think that those countries with which we compete are equally burdened, and, after the closest examination of such data as we have, I am perfectly satisfied that the cost of such insurance would be very much less than we have been led to expect. I have done my best to work out the figures in regard to mining, and I think that is an industry in respect of which the expenses are likely to be larger than those in respect of any other industry. I have taken the German official figures, and, allowing for all the difference of circumstances and conditions between Germany and this country, I have tried to see what would be the cost as regards compensation in the mining industry if the proposals contained in this Bill had been the law in Germany. I do not say it is anything more than a rough computation, but I have arrived at this result—that the percentage of compensation to wages would be 1 per cent. I have also endeavoured to apply, so far as I can, the proposals of the Bill to the mining industry of Great Britain, and it is rather significant that the figures work out almost absolutely the same—1 per cent. within one or two points of decimal. Those who are familiar with the question will know that the liabilities and risks in factories are about one-quarter of those in mines. I should like to remind the House that, as regards mines, against the 1 percentage of compensation to wages you have to put the value of the present liability under the Act of 1880, and also what I may call the moral claims and demands which are not resisted by large firms of employers who, without any legal compulsion, feel themselves constrained, in the natural course of their business, to expend large sums of money to compensate for accidents. We have to remember that we are not now considering the proposal whether the law should remain as it is, but that we are considering this alternative as against another one, and the other alternative would be some proposal like that made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite—namely, the abolition of common employment. I do not attempt to estimate exactly the amount of that liability; but when you add all those contingencies together which it is fair to take into calculation against the total liability which would be imposed under this Bill, you have got a very large diminution of that 1 per cent.—probably more than one half. I trust and hope that these proposals will do a great deal to diminish litigation. [Cheers.] The uncertain state of the law, with its undefined liabilities, offers great temptations to go to law, and we have felt that that is not beneficial either to employers or to employed, and that if we could propose a Measure which showed clearly what we thought is a fair liability on the employer it would be likely to cause a great diminution of the expenses hitherto incurred chiefly for the legal profession.

MR. J. SAMUEL (Stockton): Is it proposed to ask the workman to contribute towards this fund?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, Sir; I have said that the cost is thrown entirely upon the trade. I hope and believe it will be found that the charge will not be a heavy one, or one which can be described as an unreasonable burden upon the industry. Having had the advantage of seeing some figures representing the operations of many of the liberal firms in this country who pay compensation very much upon the scale proposed by this Bill, I may say the cost works out in the most startling way very approximately to the figures I have with regard to mining and manufacturing industries. We admit that the Bill embodies a new principle. It is a new departure, and I can quite imagine that there will be some criticism not only upon the principle, but upon the details. The House has first got to settle the question—Is this principle sound, or is it not? I venture to think, if you look at what is going on elsewhere not less than at the growth of public opinion in this country, and at what has passed in Parliament itself, you will see that there is a growing feeling that it is proper, in the sense of the words of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, to make trades responsible for the risks which they create. Well, then, is its application fair and reasonable? That is, of course, a matter for argument; I am not urging, and the Government do not pretend, that the Bill is complete or final. It is a tentative Measure; and a Bill which does require consideration. The Bill fixes the liability at not more than that which is voluntarily incurred by many of the largest and best firms of this country; it is defined and limited so that both parties may know where they stand; it provides an inexpensive method of settling questions that must arise; and if it be true that legislation of this kind ought to aim at being simple, immediate, and effective, this Bill has been conceived with that object. We desire that it should avoid litigation, and that it should give the workmen of this country the right to compensation for those accidents which unfortunately must occur in the course of their industry, and we believe that we can do so without inflicting an unjust burden on the employers.

*SIR JOSEPH PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): Irrespective of contributory negligence?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Irrespective of contributory negligence. We altogether leave that out; we do not propose to make contributory negligence a defence as regards compensation. ["Hear, hear!"] I hope I have made the Bill sufficiently clear—at all events, I have endeavoured to do so—and, in the belief that it is an honest attempt to deal with a difficult question, I commend it to the impartial consideration of the House. [Cheers.]

MR. ASQUITH: I am sure I am only expressing the general sense of the House when I say that we are greatly indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the extremely lucid and comprehensive statement which he has given us, both of the principles upon which the Bill is founded and of the detailed provisions by which it is proposed to give these principles effect. I have no quarrel to make with the historical account which the right hon. Gentleman has given of the state of this question during recent years, and of the stage it had reached when the present Government accepted office. Nor is he wrong in saying that, so far as I myself am concerned, and I believe I can speak for a very large number of my hon. Friends who sit around me, we have never expressed, and, indeed, have never entertained, any objection in point of principle to a Measure for what is called universal compensation. On the contrary, I have myself on many occasions said—expressing, I believe, an opinion that is as widely diffused on this side of the House as it is upon the other—that, if it were possible and practicable to do so, there ought to be some provision in the law of this country such as there is in the law of some foreign countries, enabling a workman who is injured through no fault of his own and through no fault of his employer, to receive—I will not say compensation, for compensation in these cases is an inadequate and often an ironical term; but to receive, at any rate, some solatium for the injury he has suffered in carrying on his operations as a soldier in the army of industry. [Cheers.] But what I have always said is that, excellent as that principle is, and important as it is, if we can arrive at a means of doing so, to give it legislative recognition and effect, there are some things which are more important still. First and foremost, there is the prevention of accidents, rather than compensation. [Cheers.] I have never pretended that the legislation for which the late Government was responsible would have been final, but we urged it upon the country because we believed it would provide not, indeed, an adequate or infallible but a large and additional safeguard to the lives and limbs of persons who were exposed to industrial dangers, and in approaching the consideration of any new scheme for dealing with this question, the first inquiry which ought to be made is—What effect will it have, not in increasing the amount of the fund to be distributed by way of compensation to the workman injured, but in reducing the risks of trade and in diminishing the number of injured workmen who have to claim compensation? [Cheers.] We have always said that the great grievance and the first grievance of the working classes of this country in this respect was to be found in the existence of the doctrine of common employment—a doctrine with which this Bill makes no attempt to deal. The doctrine of common employment was invented by the Bench, and it established a fictitious—and I venture to say fantastic—distinction between the posiof workmen and third persons as regards the liability of employers. If a third person is injured by the act of my servant, he can recover damages from me to the utmost extent of the injury; but if the person who is injured happens also to be in my employment he can recover nothing at all, although it might be supposed that I was under a greater primâ facie obligation to the man in my employment than to a perfect stranger. Such, however, has been the law for nearly 60 years, and it is that condition of the law, not founded upon ancient precedent, never sanctioned by the Legislature, which has been a great and, so we think, a legitimate grievance to the working classes of this country. We proposed to abolish that law, and that in future a workman should be in as favourable a position face to face with his employer if he sustained damage through another person in that employer's service as if he were a stranger. This Bill does not do that; the law of common employment remains, after this Bill becomes law, in the same position as now. Let me point out that as regards our proposal, be it good or bad, it proposed to deal with all the industries of the country impartially and alike. This Bill, for the first time, so far as I know, in any legislation dealing with the subject—I know the Employers' Liability Act of 1880 was subject to certain exceptions—deals only with selected industries. It introduces a new principle of discrimination—for which I have not heard any justification whatsoever—according to which the legal rights of the workman will be determined, not by the circumstances in which he sustains his injury, not upon the extent of the injury which he sustains, but by whether or not he belongs to a particular category of employment. It is all very well to say that these industries which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned are industries in which the average of accidents is highest. What consolation is that to a man who sustains equally grave and serious injury in a trade in which the percentage of accidents is lower? [Cheers.] Let the House remember that among the classes of labourers and artisans who are entirely excluded from the benefits of this Bill are the whole of our merchant seamen—["hear, hear!"]—all the agricultural labourers, all persons engaged in building operations, unless there happens to be steam power employed, and, lastly, what I regard as the most serious and most illegitimate exception of all, all men, women, and children engaged in our workshops, some of whom, I venture to say, are exposed to dangers quite as real and constant in their character, and even more pernicious in their consequences, than persons engaged in mines and factories. When the House realises that the whole of that large regiment of our industrial army are undoubtedly left out in the cold, I think they will see that the claim put forward by the right hon. Gentleman that this was an extraordinarily generous Measure is one which, at any rate, requires very close examination and scrutiny. My first observation, then, on the Bill is this—it does not do what all legislation of that kind, in our opinion, ought in the first instance to do—it does not abolish the doctrine of common employment, and even in respect of the benefits it does confer it restricts them within a comparatively narrow area of the industrial field. Before I pass from that point to another, I should like to make one observation which perhaps ought to take the form of a question. The right hon. Gentleman told us that it leaves the Employers' Liability Act of 1880 entirely untouched, and when a workman sustains injury from the wilful and wrongful act of the employer, or some person for whom the employer is responsible, he will have his choice of remedies. That is to say, he will either pursue the employer by such remedies as the present state of the law places at his disposal, or he may claim compensation if he belongs to one of the selected industries under the provisions of this Bill. The House will see, therefore, that the alternative which is given to the workman is one which does not place him in any better position than that in which he stands at present. If he chooses, thinking he will get more—and there are a very large number of cases in which he could get a great deal more than is provided under the schedule of compensation in this Bill—if he thinks he will get a larger measure of compensation by pursuing the ordinary legal remedies, then the Bill does not improve his legal position at all. He is still liable to be met by the doctrine of common employment. He is still liable to be enmeshed and entrapped in that elaborate series of pitfalls which are provided by the Employers' Liability Act of 1880; and the simplification of that Measure, for which all parties in the State have been crying out for a dozen years, which was indeed attempted by the Conservative Government of 1886, and the abolition of many of the technicalities with which it abounds, are abandoned by the author of the present Bill, and the law is left in its present unsatisfactory position. I pass now to another point. I said at the outset that we have always regarded prevention as a far more important object in legislation of this kind than compensation. How are you going to secure prevention? How are you going, under the provisions of this Bill, to add to the safeguards against the occurrence of accidents? The right hon. Gentleman has told us that is to be left to the operation, not of the civil, but of the criminal, law. I assume that the inspectors under the Mines Act and the Factory and Workshops Act are supposed by the Government to be an efficient and sufficient protection to the working classes of this country against the negligence of their employers. [Cries of "No."] Well, but the Bill gives them no other protection.

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: On that point I said that I thought the relegating of the question to insurance did not undermine safety. But the right hon. Gentleman made no more provisions in his Bill than are in this. The employer has got as much liability under this Bill as he had under that of the right hon. Gentleman. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. ASQUITH: The difference is this—that in our Bill, if you could bring home to the employer that either he or anyone in his employment had been guilty of negligence which caused the accident, there was an unlimited liability on the part of the employer to make good the injury sustained. We said that the existence of such a liability for the first time placed upon the employer by the law would operate as an incentive to his mind to make him take additional precautions, which there is no reason at present he should take. We may have been right or wrong in that, but the right hon. Gentleman is not entitled to say that our proposal was the same as his. This Bill does not give the employer any additional incentive to take precautions. [An hon. Member: "It increases his liabilities."] It increases his liabilities by making him liable for accidents which no human care or skill could avoid, but as regards accidents due to human negligence it places the employer in exactly the same position of liability as though they were not due to negligence at all. It may be a very excellent thing—I think it is a very good thing—to give the workman the right to compensation under all circumstances if you can work it out. But how that could be said to increase the incentive to the employer to take precautions I am unable to comprehend. It is quite true that when a man is injured it does not matter to him a bit from the point of view of compensation whether he is injured by the negligence of his employer or by what lawyers call the act of God. The amount of injury which he sustains is exactly the same, and the amount of compensation to be put into his pocket ought to be exactly the same. But when you are looking at it from the point of view of the community and the working classes at large, when you are seeking by your legislation to establish some additional incentive to make employers avoid negligence, it makes all the difference in the world, and I think employers both on the grounds of policy and justice ought to be made to incur as large a measure of liability in the one case as in the other. To leave that measure of liability to be enforced by the criminal law amounts to providing no additional safeguard at all. ["Hear, hear!"] I will not say anything as to details, because it would be better to have the Bill before us when we criticise matters of mere detail. I will not say anything, therefore, by way of minute criticism in regard to the scale of compensation except to say that the maximum compensation for any injury short of death is the weekly payment of £1; and it is quite obvious that compensation recoverable by proceedings under this Bill will and must in a very large number of cases be very considerably less than the compensation which the workman would receive if he enforced the ordinary legal remedies, provided the legal remedies were enlarged in the way suggested by our Bill. Then, Sir, I come to a point which is one more of principle than of detail—the question of contracting out. The right hon. Gentleman says it is better to provide compensation by mutual agreement than by law—[Ministerial cheers]—for matters of this kind. So it is; I do not think there is any doubt about that anywhere; and in the whole controversy about contracting out, I may remind the House, our position, or my position, at all events, has always been uniformly and consistently this—that the prohibition of contracting out would not have, and ought not to have, any influence whatever on mutual beneficial arrangements between master and men. That is a controversial question—["hear, hear!"]—which I am prepared to discuss when necessary. I only say that in regard to our position, in order not to let it be supposed that I accept the alternative put forward by the right hon. Gentleman that I am an enemy of mutual agreement. Let me point out that on neither side of the House is there any advocate of free contract in this matter. We are not advocates of free contract, because we think if the law chooses to give certain rights and obligations in the interest of the community it ought not to be in the power of individuals by private arrangement among themselves to lower the standard of protection which the law intends in the interest of all. But neither are the Government opposite, or their followers, disciples of free contract. Would it be possible for me under this Bill to make arrangements with my employés to contract myself out of the scope of the Bill? Not at all. I have got to send the proposed arrangement to the Registrar of Friendly Societies. Is that free contract? I do not know why the Registrar of Friendly Societies has been selected for the performance of this most invidious and difficult duty, or what special qualifications he has for the task. ["Hear, hear!"] But if he, being constituted the authority in the matter, chooses to say, "I do not think your contract is a good one or a reasonable one," I am not able to make any contract at all. That may be a wise or an unwise arrangement. But let us clearly understand at the outset that is not freedom of contract; and it is because right hon. Gentlemen opposite, now that they have come to consider the question with the responsibility of office upon them, have seen that it would be impossible to allow freedom of contract without whittling away the law altogether——

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): We never proposed it in Opposition. [Cheers.]

MR. ASQUITH: I suppose the right hon. Gentleman is referring to the Dudley Amendment. ["Hear, hear!"] Well, the history of that Amendment, which began very nearly at the point of free contract, was a history of the gradual whittling away of the principle of free contract. [An HON. MEMBER: "No!"] Yes, step by step; and that Amendment underwent as many transformations as almost any legislative proposal made in this House. I agree that this is quite in the spirit of the Dudley Amendment in its last form, but I must say that it provides a less effective means for the determination of the question. In my judgment no Government Department is really adequately equipped for the performance of this most difficult task of determining whether a contract between A and his workmen does or does not give to those workmen the same measure of benefit as the general law. I say it is far better to leave these matters in the hands of the Legislature itself. You may be perfectly certain that in 999 cases out of 1,000, if the workman has an arrangement with his employer which secures to him rights and obligations quite as beneficial to him as those which the law gives him, he would not be such a fool as to incur the expense and hazard of litigation by invoking the tribunals of the country. As to the provision of the Bill that these matters should be referred to arbitration, I am in entire sympathy with it. I think it is one of the great scandals of our law that the costs of proceedings in proportion to the results obtained should be so high. The costs and the delay, be it observed, are due to the unnecessary complexity and technicalities of the law itself. So far as it goes I am entirely in favour of the principle of referring these matters to arbitration, nor have I any objection whatever to the somewhat novel proposal, with which I am in complete sympathy, that the necessary cost of tribunals of this kind should be defrayed, not by the parties, but by the State. I will not now consider the question that was entered upon by the right hon. Gentleman as to what will be the extent of the pecuniary burden which a proposal of this kind will cast on the industries of the country. All estimates, as I am sure all will agree, must at the present stage be premature, and to a large extent conjectural. I do not suppose—I never have supposed—that a system of universal compensation would impose a crushing burden upon our industries. I do think, however, that it is a complete mistake to suppose that a burden such as this will be borne entirely by the employer, and I suppose most economists would agree in that view. The right hon. Gentleman himself spoke of the burden that is to be cast upon and sustained by the trade, and the word trade of course means not merely the employer, but all the various interests which are concerned in the trade. Whether in the ultimate allocation of that burden the larger share will fall upon profits or upon wages, or whether it will be possible to transfer under existing economic conditions any appreciable portion of that burden upon the consumer in the shape of an added price of goods, are questions upon which opinions may very well differ. For my own part I have always thought, and if it becomes necessary to do so I am quite prepared for it, that a larger share of the burden under existing economic conditions will fall upon wages, and that neither in the shape of an added price to be taken from the consumer, nor a diminished profit from the employer, will workmen obtain the benefit resulting from schemes of this kind. I do not say that that is in the least degree an objection; on the contrary, if the workmen of the country with their eyes open are prepared to tax themselves for the purpose of obtaining better compensation for industrial accidents, I think they will be taking a very prudent and far-sighted course. It must not be supposed, however, that the necessary result and consequence of legislation of this kind will be that the whole burden will fall on the employer, and that the workmen will not have to pay anything. I have made simply those observations which occur to me at the moment on the Measure as it has been expounded to us by the right hon. Gentleman. It appears to me, I must say, upon the first hearing, to be deficient in some of the most important characteristics which any measure dealing with this question or series of questions ought to contain, but I need not say that we shall give it when it is printed, and in our hands a most extended, and, I hope, thoroughly impartial examination. I think there will be a desire in all parts and from both sides of the House to do anything that appears to be reasonably practicable to improve the condition and prospects of men who are unavoidably injured in the course of industrial employment. [Cheers.]

SIR ARTHUR FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk) said he was sure the Bill would be received on that side of the House with approval and satisfaction. It proceeded very largely on the lines of a Measure which it was his privilege to introduce into the House three years ago, when he had the support of his right hon. Friend the present Secretary for the Colonies. The point in the Bill to which he attached great importance was the proposal for compensation to workmen in cases of accident however they had been caused. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken would have brought no compensation in 75 cases out of 100, because before any compensation could be obtained by a workman he would have had to prove either that the accident arose from the neglect of his employer or of a fellow-workman. Anything that would obviate the enormous expense involved in appeals to litigation in connection with accidents was much to be commended. The right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had told them that this Bill did not abolish the doctrine of common employment, and was not, in his judgment, a sufficient incentive to the employer to take reasonable means for the protection of those in his employ. He demurred distinctly to those two propositions. As he understood the explanation of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, he left the responsibility of the employer, in cases of his neglect or the neglect of those whom he placed in authority, in precisely the same position as it was in to-day, and he left to the workman the right to proceed against the employer in cases where he had been negligent. What, he asked, could be a stronger incentive to the employer to do his part in protecting the lives and limbs of his workmen than that he should be made liable to an unlimited extent in cases where he was at fault? But when they came to the question of common employment and accidents arising from the negligence of fellow-workmen, he would ask, was it possible for an employer to protect his workmen from the carelessness of their fellow-workmen? The employer was no more liable for the carelessness of workmen in his employ causing accidents to their fellow-workmen than was anyone outside the works. This Bill gave to the employer the strongest inducement which was necessary to protect the lives and limbs of his workpeople. As he understood the present proposal, any workman who had met with an accident could obtain a substantial sum in compensation without litigation, and therefore he thought this Bill was far in advance of the proposal of the right hon. Member for East Fife. Undoubtedly the fault of the Bill was the limitation of trade. He was glad to hear the Home Secretary say that this was a tentative Measure, for he could not but think that as time went on other trades must be brought within its purview. Other more or less dangerous employments were undertaken by men in the housebuilding and shipbuilding trades, by men employed on railway works, such as excavators, by stevedores, and by certain tramway employés. He had no doubt that before it left the House the scope of the Bill would be much widened so as to include many other trades not less dangerous in their character than those enumerated in the Bill. It might perhaps be wise to proceed gradually and steadily, and rather limit the number of trades to be brought within the scope of the Bill until the country is fully alive to the liability which employers will be placed under. He wished to ask his right hon. Friend whether it was contemplated that in contracting out employer and employed were both to contribute to the fund, and, if so, whether the Registrar of Friendly Societies in coming to a decision would have to take into consideration, in regard to the value of the proposal made to a workman, how much it was to cost the workman, and how much better it would be than that offered in the Bill? He did not see how the Registrar was to measure the benefits that a workman would obtain under this scheme. The compensation provided for by the Bill would not be an onerous charge on the industries of the country. There were few trades in which 1 per cent. on the annual amount of wages would not cover all cases of injury and compensationtion for accidents. One remarkable instance had come to his knowledge. In an industry employing 15,000 men and paying £1,200,000 in wages the compensation payable was not far off that offered under the Bill; yet from the accounts of the concern, which he had an opportunity of examining, the cost of compensation for accidents on the wages did not amount to more than 6s. 8d. per cent. The average accidents were no less than 12 per cent. on the number of men employed, and they varied from 1 per cent. in one industry to no less than 20 per cent. in another carried on by the same firm. Yet the cost of compensation did not average more than 6s. 8d. on the wages paid. But above and beyond compensation was the security such a Bill as this would afford to the workman and his family when the former was suffering from an accident and unable to follow his employment. The thousands of cases of distress arising from accidents to workmen through no fault of their own in which Poor Law relief had to be given would be met by the provisions of this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington) said the House was under an obligation to the Home Secretary for the clearness and fulness with which he had placed the provisions of the Bill before them. They understood sufficient of the Bill to enable them to form some kind of judgment upon its scope and what it would effect. While it was seldom possible to come to a definite and final conclusion on a Bill upon its introduction he had listened attentively to the Home Secretary, and he felt not only considerable disappointment, but repugnance to the scheme of this Bill. On this question there were only two ways of proceeding, either on the footing of prevention or compensation. In the Debate of the Bill of 1893, the Secretary for the Colonies declared that what the workmen wanted was not compensation in the limited class of accidents at which the Bill struck, but compensation for all accidents. It was pointed out in the Debate that no pecuniary compensation that could be given would really compensate a man who had lost a limb, or a family who had lost by death their breadwinner, for that loss. He thought the House was agreed on the principle of compensation for all accidents. Yet here was a Bill which did less than nothing to prevent accidents and did what was inadequate towards cure. The object of the Bill of 1893 was the prevention of accidents and prevention only. It sought to give compensation in certain cases in which compensation was not given. But it was not professed that compensation could be adequate, complete, or could be made thoroughgoing; and the main object of the Bill was to make it unlikely that accidents should occur in places where they were likely to occur if exceptional care was not taken. The Bill of 1893 swept away the doctrine of common employment and sought to restore the workman to the position, which judge-made law had taken from him, of being as well off as a stranger before the common law. It sought to prevent the employer from contracting out of his obligation to his workmen any more than he was able to do so with regard to strangers. The provision against contracting out was not something in the interest of individual workmen or individual groups of workmen. It was pointed out on the Liberal side of the House that the provision against contracting out was essential, because the obligation to be careful was an obligation imposed not in the interests of individual workmen, but of the public generally and the community at large, and to which no exception could be made. Did Parliament provide for an employer to contract out of his criminal liability under the Factory Acts, or make any exception to the rules which our industrial legislation was making more prevalent. He admitted that the Bill of 1893 was not a complete and satisfactory remedy for the existing state of things. Personally, he was not only not opposed to compensation, but was strongly in favour of compensation under conditions. He believed that we should never get a satisfactory system of legislation for the protection of workmen until we had not only prevention, but a complete system of compensation such as obtained in Continental countries, and which it was within the competence of this Parliament to endeavour to give. But while he was strongly in favour of compensation, compensation was one thing and this Bill was another. He agreed that there were two great advantages in the Bill now before the House. One was that it applied to more accidents than the present law applied to, and the other was that it diminished litigation. A man ought to be able to get compensation for personal injuries through accidents as easily as he could obtain compensation if insured against fire. His claim ought to be paid without dispute on proof that damage had been done. But the compensation given under the Bill applied only to a certain class of workmen and a certain class of employers, and was limited in amount. The Bill would not tend to the prevention of accidents. If compensation were to be given in the form provided by the Bill there was one thing to guard against. If an employer were liable for all accidents and insured against them, provided the insurance company bore the brunt of the accidents, what would it matter to him whether there were many accidents or few? The Bill took away from him the motive to be careful, the motive which existed under the present law, under which an accident arising from negligence brought liability upon him.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: He can insure under the present law.

*MR. HALDANE: Yes, but in many cases he did not insure, whereas now he would insure constantly. The Bill applied to a larger number of accidents, and the motive to insure would be greater, and the Bill did not distinguish between accidents in which he had been negligent and those in which he had not been. That had been recognised on the Continent and elsewhere, and it had been seen that there were only two ways in which, having got a scheme of compensation, they could make it a sound one—on the basis of bringing in prevention as well as cure. A scheme of compensation ought to do two things. It ought to provide some method for securing publicity whenever an accident took place. They had that method in the case of death, but in the Bill the Government had no scheme for bringing the matter to the public notice when an accident resulted in something short of death, and showing who had or had not been negligent. He thought the scheme of the Bill was deficient in so far as it made no provision for anything of that sort, and it was deficient for something else. If they were going to have a scheme of compensation and wanted to keep up the motive to be careful, they ought to have some sort of remedy over. In Germany they had the trade brought in. They had an association of employers, and every workman injured was entitled to call for compensation from that association, and he got it at once, whether he had been negligent or not. The association had a remedy over against the employer who had been negligent; but there was no remedy over in this Bill. There was the option of bringing an action under the existing Employers' Liability Act, but that was an Act which limited the amount of compensation which could be recovered. The right hon. Gentleman's scale was more liberal. What would be the motive of the workman to resort to that? He would be harrassed and worried whilst he might not recover so much, and he could see very little motive to assert this Common Law right. He said that the Government were doing nothing by introducing this scheme to impress upon the mind of the employer the necessity and duty of being careful, and the obligation to prevent rather than to cure. It did nothing to carry out what the Secretary for the Colonies expressed as his view of what ought to be done, and what as an inseparable condition ought to accompany a scheme of compensation.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, no. The hon. and learned Gentleman misrepresented me before on this matter. I will explain what I did say. I said you were making a mistake if you thought that by the infliction of pecuniary fines you would secure any prevention; that the prevention must be dealt with in another way—namely, by effective criminal measures taken against the employer, or by such measures of protection as are given by the Factories and Mines Regulation Acts, and that if that law was now declared to be found to be beneficial I should be perfectly prepared to extend its provisions. I am in exactly the same position now. I did not make it dependent upon or connected with a totally different question, which is the question of some solatium or pecuniary consideration to people injured by unavoidable accidents.

*Mr. HALDANE said that was the very point he had been making. The right hon. Gentleman by his Amendment had proposed compensation for all accidents. They pointed out to him that in that case it would impose the sanction of employers' liability, as it was at present, that compensation was given where an employer had been negligent, and not where he had not been negligent. The right hon. Gentleman then admitted that it would be necessary to add something to the Amendment in order to apply that sanction. He quite agreed that it was in the form of effective measures, and that the right hon. Gentleman's proposal was that there should be something analogous to the sanction which existed under the factory legislation at the present time, but the point was that this compensation alone, without sanction of that kind, was insufficient for the protection of the workman. That was what was wholly absent under the Bill they were at present discussing. If this had been a Bill for giving compensation, upon the footing of prevention brought in with it for carrying out the principle in some shape or form of the German system, under which the insurers paid, and there was then the same liability over on the part of the negligent employers as there was at the present time, he should have found himself in a very different attitude towards it. But that was not the scheme, and it seemed to him that the Bill was objectionable from many points of view. It was objectionable from the point of view of the public, because it diminished the stigma which there was upon the negligent employer at the present time. He was now liable for all accidents, instead of being liable only for these. It was objectionable from the point of view of the workman, because it did not give him what it professed—namely, a complete system of compensation, and did not aim at his interests as fully as those interests ought to be protected; and it was objectionable in the third place from the point of view of the employer, because it was a tax upon industry, and he thought it would in the result be found to be a tax upon wages. It was a Bill for imposing liability on the individual employer, and the small employer who was cast in £300 damages might have a heavy liability imposed upon him in proportion to his capital.

*Mr. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) observed that there could be no earthly doubt that the Bill did not make the practice of insurance more probable than did the opposing scheme of 1893. There could be equally no doubt the expense of that insurance under the Bill would not fall upon wages, if it fell upon wages at all, to one whit greater an extent than the scheme of 1893. He was glad to have it admitted that the Bill did considerably and substantially extend the principle of compensation to workmen for injuries received, and he should be interested to notice whether, when they came to the critical stages of the Measure, there would be found any hon. Member who would be prepared to say that because along with compensation they were not going to give the workman prevention as well (which he did not admit could be said with truth), therefore the workman should not have compensation. He confessed he found it very hard to believe that any Gentleman would be discovered so rash, and forming so incorrect an opinion of the real wishes of the working classes of this country, as would be involved in such a very mischievous contention. There was another contention he wished to combat, and that was that the scheme of 1893 was in fact a scheme of prevention. It was nothing of the kind. ["Hear, hear!"] Had it made the employer's legal liability stop at the point where his moral liability might be said to stop it would have been such a scheme, but it did not do so. It was interesting to notice that both this Bill and the Bill of 1893 left exactly where it always stood and where it ought to stand the legal as well as the moral liability of the negligent employer himself and agent. ["Hear, hear!"] What was the other reason why the scheme of 1893 was not a scheme of prevention? Not only had the employer no interest under that scheme in distinguishing between the cases in which he might be held liable for negligence, and those in which he might not, but that scheme also left him free, and probably left him under greater motives than did the present Bill to have recourse to the practice of insurance. The result was that had the scheme of 1893 been carried into law it would have given the workman compensation in the smallest number of cases with the greatest amount of friction, and in circumstances under which it was quite reasonable to say that he would always have been fighting not really against his employer, but against a fleshless, bloodless, soulless, and pitiless corporation called an insurance company, which made its gains by receiving the greatest amount of premiums, and paying the smallest amount of claims. In substitution for that they had the present scheme, and he congratulated the Government on taking a step forward, and a logical step as compared with the timid, halting, and illogical proposals of 1893. ["Hear, hear!"] If they were going to extend employers' liability beyond the cases occasioned by the employer's negligence they had better extend it to the whole area of probable risks and losses likely to be incurred. But no scheme of compensation had yet been produced which could be shown to have been also a scheme of prevention. Such was certainly not the scheme of 1893, and he ventured in the Debates of that year to point out that prevention really should be left to Measures actually preventive in their professed object, such as the preventive provisions of those statutes relating to what were called the regulated industries. He thought the Government had probably taken a prudent course in giving, in the first instance, a restricted scope to the Bill as regarded, in the first place, the industries to which the Bill applied, and in the second place, as regarded the pecuniary value of the compensation to be accorded to the injured man. Possibly it might be found in the succeeding Debates that the Government might be led to take a bolder course even than they had, and to give further extension to the number of the industries to which the Bill was to be paid. There were, no doubt, some trades describable as dangerous, to which the present Bill would not apply. Those, however, were few, and the greater number of the industries to which the Bill did not apply were not so describable. But if justification was to be sought—and the late Home Secretary argued as if no justification were to be found—for making this selected list of industries, he believed it was to be found in the French law introduced in the French Chamber in 1888, and which, he believed, became the form adopted by the Legislature—that of the simple principle of making the employer liable only in the case of dangerous industries, leaving him free to insure against his liability. The amount of compensation was matter for compromise and for reasonable consideration. He congratulated the Government on having the courage to very largely increase the liabilities of employers; to have done that in the most simple and effective way in which a statute could do; to have practically, subject only to the pecuniary limit, abolished the doctrine of common employment; and to have made the employer liable for injuries to his workmen, even though those injuries might have been inflicted by the negligence of a fellow-workman. The merit of this Bill was that it even went further, and laid even heavier liabilities on the employers, and he thought that when they took into consideration the close resemblance this Bill had to the scheme which was brought under the searching gaze of the working classes in and previous to the year 1895, and which, in some typical constituencies of working men, especially of railway working men, was one of the foremost subjects of consideration in the election of 1895—and when they bore in mind that in all those constituencies the supporters of what might be called the Dudley scheme, as distinguished from the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill of 1893, were returned to that House—the Government had not only wisely considered the principles of logic and equity, but had also paid practical consideration to the ascertained wishes of the working classes. [Cheers.]

*SIR CHARLES DILKE said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had distinguished very sharply—and he agreed with him—between preventive legislation and compensative legislation, whether by means of general insurance or otherwise. Speaking as one by no means likely to oppose the present Bill, he regretted that the Government had not proposed to legislate by two Measures virtually at the same time, or at all events in the same Session, with regard to those two heads of the subject. He believed they would have avoided the very widespread opposition, perhaps the mistaken opposition, which this particular Measure would meet with if they at the same time proposed a Measure for increasing the responsibility upon the other side of the question to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded. His own belief was that this Bill would meet with very violent opposition, in which he was not likely to take part, but so widespread as that it was unlikely to pass in the course of the present Session. If he was right in that belief, he hoped that whenever they came to consider it again the Government would attempt to accompany this Measure by a Measure increasing the responsibility for safety, and dealing with the other side of the question. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that there would be a better state of things as regarded insurance under this Bill than would have existed under the Bill of the late Home Secretary. It seemed to him that the state of things would be the same. At this moment there was almost universal insurance in the cotton trade of Lancashire. Therefore it would not be fair for them to deal with this Bill as if it were likely to increase insurance, inasmuch as in some of the leading trades insurance was general at the present time. The main objection to be taken to this Bill in principle, when they compared it with the German law, to which the Home Secretary made several friendly allusions, was one which struck at the whole root of the Bill, and which would lead to this Bill being attacked in Germany by those who were advocates of the German system. Those who attached most importance to the success of the German system, those who were most proud of it in Germany, had always said that the very root of that system was trade responsibility as contrasted with individual responsibility. ["Hear, hear!"] There was no trade responsibility in this Bill. The responsibility was entirely individual. What was to be the practical bearing of this individual risk? The insurance company would still conduct the litigation. The employer would still get all the ill feeling that might be aroused from the litigation, but it was the insurance company which would really conduct it. That was not so under the German system. Then, again, under the German system, the trade association had the power of inspection, of levying increased contributions and of fining. They appointed their own inspectors in addition to the factory inspectors of the Government, and undoubtedly, therefore, under the German system of trade responsibility, as against individual responsibility, they had a security for safety that they would not find within the four corners of this Bill. Then, again, in the case of bankruptcy, under this Bill, as he understood it, the workman would still suffer and would still fail to get the compensation which he ought to be awarded. That was another defect which arose out of not following the German system more completely. They could not expect, perhaps, to give on that occasion a final opinion as to their views, but he was bound to say that with regard to the contracting-out, as it had been called, if they were to have an outside authority who was to pronounce upon the sufficiency of such schemes, he did not share the views of the late Home Secretary as to the character of the particular authority proposed. If they were to have such an authority at all it did seem to him that the very best authority that could be selected was the Registrar of Friendly Societies. He was the person who at the present moment was concerned with the rules of these new societies, to see whether they were thoroughly advantageous to the men; and the reports he made to that House on all private Bills that affected the wages of the men and on funds which were formed for their benefit, showed that he was thoroughly cognisant with the working of those societies, and that he thoroughly understood what was the true advantage of the worker. The matter had been brought before him in such a manner that he was more competent than any other authority who could be named in this country. The only other point he should like to mention concerned the exclusions in the Bill. He quite admitted that there was something to be said for making the Bill only partial when the Government were making so large a new departure. At the same time some of the particular exclusions were, he thought, to be regretted. The distinction set up between the class of buildings where steam cranes were used and the class of buildings where they were not used seemed to be entirely indefensible. The building trade was one of the most dangerous in the country, and the dangers arose not so much from steam cranes as from ordinary scaffolding accidents. Of course, the use of steam cranes was extending in building operations in large towns, and more buildings would come under the Bill from year to year; but still he thought it was impossible to defend the distinction. Another exclusion which he deeply regretted was that of the merchant shipping trade, which was one of the most dangerous occupations. But, generally, he was disposed to think that there was ground for the Government attempting only to deal with the main trades first, and undoubtedly they would be dealing with the vast majority of accidents in dealing with those trades. [Ministerial cheers.] In Germany there were 18 millions of people who were insured, but practically out of that number only those who were employed in coal mines, factories, railways, and buildings had any accidents. About 13 millions out of those 18 millions had practically very few accidents indeed. Agriculture and forestry, employing millions of people in Germany, had almost disappeared from the lists so far as accidents were concerned. If this new departure were taken they would soon have to level up the trades excluded and make the system general.

*MR. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby) said that they had been working for many years to obtain reforms, but in this Measure they had obtained, not so much a reform as a partial revolution. He suggested that concurrently with the proposals now laid before the House a Bill should be introduced embodying some reforms which many of those interested in labour questions thought were urgently needed. For example, there should be a Bill embodying the abolition of the doctrine of common employment, strengthening the penalties with regard to liability, to increase the amount of compensation, the simplification of procedure, and, if necessary, the use of a State prosecutor to enforce the law, further limitations with regard to unhealthy trades, and further regulations as to dangerous trades. Those seemed to be provisions which were urgently required as to all forms of trades, and not only to those dealt with in the proposals of the Government. The proposals of the Government, he said, involved a partial revolution; it was a revolution in the direction of a system which had been introduced and enforced for several years in Germany. Some disadvantages had attended the working of that system. In the first place, there had been a remarkable increase in the number of industrial accidents in Germany. The Home Secretary said that that increase had not been a serious one. It was recognised, however, by all who had studied the literature of the subject, and it was admitted at the Milan Congress by the representatives of the German insurance offices that the increase, if not in fatal, at any rate, in the lighter forms of accident had been something enormous. It was admitted at that Congress that the working men showed increased carelessness, and, what was far more serious, an amount of negligence and malingering hitherto absent in Germany. The workman in Germany had shown no scruples in preying on the funds. Another important element to consider was the supervision by the man's comrades in the case of malingering. Under these proposals it would be nobody's business to see that a man resumed work as soon as possible. Above all, a new feature had appeared in Germany in connection with the scheme—namely, the extreme resentment manifested by the working classes at any delay or refusal in the payment of the funds to meet accidents; and this feeling of resentment would have to be guarded against in the proposals of the Government. It was generally believed that under the system prevailing in Germany the workman obtained his compensation the moment the accident took place; but, as a matter of fact, hon. Members would find that appeals were made on a gigantic scale. The appeals last year from the associations of employers to the Committees of Arbitration suggested by the Home Secretary amounted to 38,000. It was supposed that under this system, when introduced in Germany, the central office in Berlin would never require to act; but last year there were 12,000 appeals to Berlin from the local arbitration societies, 2,000 of which had been left over from the previous year. Under the German system, at any rate, there was, and probably under the present scheme there would be, all the delay and vexation which it was thought to be so desirable to avoid. As to the economic tests and the effect on wages of any scheme of this kind, he said that the greatest authorities in Germany believed that wages were reduced by such schemes. [Cries of "No!"] At any rate, in the long run the expense would be borne by the working classes, either as wage-earners, or as consumers, or as taxpayers. Again, it was found that employers would not subscribe to charitable purposes so liberally as before, while the large diminution of Poor Law expenses which it was expected would result had not so far taken place. A scheme of insurance of this kind would press heavily on the small employer, who was gradually being crushed out of existence. So far as Germany and Austria were concerned, no measure of social peace had been brought about. The bad feeling between employers and workmen was increasing, and it was largely due to the insurance schemes of those countries. Another objection to the scheme was that under it they were labelling men according to some special category, and it would thereafter be difficult for a workman to pass from one branch of industry to another. At later stages attempts would be made to extend the revolutionary scheme proposed in the Bill to other industries, and in view of the opposition which would certainly be aroused by the Bill when its provisions came to be understood, he again expressed the hope that the Government would introduce, concurrently, a Measure to abolish the doctrine of common employment, and effect the other much needed reform he had indicated.

Mr. W. ALLAN (Gateshead) demurred to the suggestion that insurance would necessarily tend to the reduction of wages. The question of insurance need not affect workmen's wages at all. In a scheme of insurance carried out by an employer his premiums were a charge for which he made provision when he made his contracts and fixed his prices. Speaking generally, there were two points in the Bill which deserved serious consideration, and if these were attended to the Government would deserve the gratitude of every workman in the country. In the first place the Government would be well advised to make the scheme applicable to all workers. It would be a great blunder to have only a select body of workmen deriving benefits from this insurance, and difficulties would arise in differentiating between excluded and included workmen. The classes of workmen whom the right hon. Member made provision for were workmen on railways, in mines, in factories, and in engineering works. Why was the operation of the Bill limited to them? It would not apply to men in shipbuilding yards, in forges, or in printing foundries, or to men who attended merry-go-rounds and other machines of that kind, yet accidents occasionally occurred in all these employments. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to extend the application of the Bill. The Bill was also open to criticism, because it would permit men to contract out of their claim to compensation. This Measure was practically a scheme of general compensation for four special branches of industry in this country. Why, then, put in "contracting out"? Did they intend a man to contract out of his claim to compensation? That would be absurd. Let them consider the case of a fitter or turner who was out of work, and who wanted food for his wife and children. He went to a factory and asked for employment. "Yes," the foreman said, "I will give you a job, but sign that." When the man signed he was not really a free agent; there was no mutuality of agreement, and he was signing away his wife and children's right to compensation.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That could not be done under the Bill. Contracting out is only allowed under certain well-defined conditions.

MR. ALLAN said that anyhow, that was a good example of what contracting out meant at present. With regard to the insurance that was contemplated, he proposed to give a litle of his own experience. In the factory with which he was connected there was a Mutual Accident Fund, which was managed by the men themselves. From this they received 10s. a week when they met with any accidents, and in addition to this Accident Fund they might belong to any Friendly or Trade Union Society. He insured the men himself against death or accident, the premium he paid being 1s. 3d. per £100 of wages, and if a man met with a fatal accident his family received three years' wages. A great many Members seemed to think that as a result of insurance workmen would be saddled with litigation by the insurance companies. He did not share that opinion. The cases of litigation of that kind in the North of England had been very few indeed, and as a rule the insurance companies settled the matter quietly. For example, some four months ago workmen were mending the propellor of a large steamer; to the propellors two chains were attached, and one of these gave way, and striking a workman in the back killed him. The facts were reported to the insurance society and the man's wife received £200 at once, although the man had not been in his then employment for more than six months. Insurance associations did not like litigation; they were afraid that those who paid the premiums would go against them as witnesses. He believed that every employer in this country could insure his workmen for a very moderate premium. The companies knew that Government inspectors examined machinery, and that gave them security. They also ascertained for themselves that machines were well guarded, and they took care to insert in their policies a provision that all reasonable care must be taken to prevent accidents. He observed that the proposal of the Home Secretary was that a workman who was incapacitated should receive £1 a week. He wanted to know how long that payment was to continue.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: During the incapacity.

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The payment will go on for the time of his natural existence, if the man is permanently incapacitated.

MR. ALLAN thought that that was a generous provision. He felt sure that if the right hon. Gentleman would eliminate the two points to which he had drawn attention from the Bill, he would deserve the gratitude of everyone in the country. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. GEORGE WHITELEY (Stockport) congratulated the Government and the Home Secretary upon the introduction of the Bill. Under the Employers' Liability Act of 1880 it was one thing to claim for injuries and a very different thing to obtain the compensation. The fact that in future contracting out would only be permitted where it improved the position of a workman as compared with that given by the Bill, disposed once for all of any quarrel in the House over that question. He still believed that there existed among the working classes a real and not a simulated desire to retain the power they possessed of contracting out. When they remembered that almost all the provisions in the proposed Bill existed with their European and American competitors, it would be a sorry matter if they, who took a pride in being the workshop of the world and the hub of the universe, lagged behind in this great matter. The Bill would give compensation for all injuries, subject to the provision that there was what he might call a close time for employers of two weeks after an injury had been inflicted. That seemed to him a rather restricted period. It seemed to him that it would be an improvement, not only for the employer but for the workman, if the period was extended to one month. The late Home Secretary had endeavoured to belittle the Bill by a comparison with his own abortive Measure, but he was sure that the workman would prefer a Bill which gave him compensation in all cases on the basis proposed by the present Measure to the chance of compensation given by the Bill of 1893. ["Hear, hear!"] He regarded as the blot on the Bill the limitation of its advantages to certain trades. ["Hear, hear!"] If the Government would extend it to all, it would be a very material advantage to all concerned. He had gone into the question of insurance very carefully, and he thought the Home Secretary had much exaggerated the cost. He had the tariffs of about 20 insurance companies, and he did not think the present rates would be more than trebled at the outside. At the present time in the cotton and textile trades the rate was 9d. per £100 of wages, and he believed a premium of about 2s. 6d. per cent. of wages would be sufficient to cover the cost under the Bill. With regard to the manner in which employers and workpeople ought to arrive at a settlement of their differences, he thought the very best method of procedure would be by the county courts, and the expense of such litigation might reasonably be made a charge either upon the locality or upon the national exchequer. He could not see how increased danger and reduced protection and safeguards would result from a scheme of general compensation. The Home Office now had plenary powers, and in addition to the Government inspectors—who were sometimes fussy to a ridiculous extent—there was no doubt that insurance companies, for their own protection, would insist upon protective measures, and would have differential rates in order to guard themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] Generally speaking, he thought they could congratulate the House upon the Bill. It reached the bed-rock on this matter, and settled once for all a very thorny point, for it would safeguard the workman in his employment, and give him full compensation for any injury which he might unfortunately sustain. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR JOSEPH PEASE thought the Bill was essentially one the House ought to see in print before they came to a judgment upon it, and he had no doubt that his right hon. Friend, before he asked for a Second Reading, would give hon. Members ample opportunity to send the Bill to their constituents, and ascertain their views upon it. Whilst he observed with great satisfaction that it was proposed to place a new safeguard on contracting out, that question was still left perfectly open so long as the scheme on which a man contracted out was equally as good for him as the provisions of the Bill. Among his constituents there was a strong feeling against contracting out. They alleged that the question for them was under what conditions would their lives and limbs be best preserved. The workmen said—and he had had many discussions with them on the subject—that there was nothing safeguarded them so much as the fact that if injury resulted to them by the carelessness of those who employed them, or those who were the representatives of the employer, they were able to bring them before the courts of justice. In his own experience of 14 or 15 years since the present Employers' Liability Act was passed, he was able to say that, although employing 5,000 or 6,000 men, they had never had but two actions threatened, and they were compromised for £7. It was the small and the poor and bad employer who required contracting out, and not the large employer. In the great coal districts of Northumberland and Durham there was no contracting out, and yet the benevolent societies were thoroughly well maintained, and the periodical audits by experts showed that they were in good and thorough working order. As to the question on whom increased charges upon industries ultimately fell, it was difficult to lay down any strict or special line, but where an employer had been working, as many hundreds and thousands had been during the last few years, without any margin of profit at all, the charge naturally fell on the wages themselves. He did not say he considered that altogether a thing to be deprecated, but this was a question to be considered seriously before the Bill passed. For his own part he believed the working-class constituencies of this country would prefer the Bill of the late Home Secretary to that now presented to the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Perhaps a few words of explanation may have the effect of shortening the Debate, because some of the arguments and statements to which the House has listened apply to an incorrect appreciation of the real purpose and provisions of the Bill. On the whole, I think the Government have every reason to be satisfied with the Debate so far as it has gone. I hope that when the Bill is in the hands of hon. Members it will be found even better than may appear at first sight, and that the oppositon with which it is threatened will be modified, if it does not greatly disappear. Of one thing I am perfectly certain, and that is that the great mass of the working classes of the country, when they understand what an enormous boon it is proposed to confer upon them, whatever additions they may wish to the Bill, will not desire that it should be defeated. ["Hear, hear!"] Before I go to one or two points of detail, let me say a word on one point of principle. My right hon. Friend the late Home Secretary raised a point as though it were a question between prevention and compensation. That is not the case. I venture to say that this Bill will do something for prevention, but, putting that aside for the moment, I believe the Bill may stand very well on its merits as being a Bill for compensation alone. If you consider that, under the existing state of the law, something like 12 per cent. only of accidents are in any way dealt with in the shape of compensation, the House can understand that a Bill which is going to bring in for the first time 88 per cent. more is a Measure of such importance that it may very well stand on its own bottom. [Cheers.] I entirely agree with what fell from my hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Haldane), that, if it can be proved that the existing preventive arrangements are insufficient, that is a reason for additional preventive arrangements; but why I interrupted him was because, at all events, I myself have never yet been convinced that such additional precautions were urgently required. In regard to the question of prevention, we have a whole series of enactments which have been elaborated during a long course of years, and which have taken shape in the Factory Acts, the Workshops Act, the Mines Regulation Act, and in other Acts affecting the health and safety of persons engaged in industrial employments. I do not, of course, maintain that those Acts are perfect, but it is evidently more urgent in the circumstances to endeavour to pass legislation which would bring compensation for every accident whatever—those which are inevitable as well as those which are preventable—than it is to make further Amendments in an Act which has already been amended on successive occasions during the last 10 or 20 years. While agreeing that prevention is of the greatest importance, I differ entirely with my right hon. Friend opposite and others in their view that the Bill of my right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Asquith) would have been any more in the interests of prevention than our Bill. That, at all events, I absolutely deny. If you want to have greater preventive regulations you must seek for them in Amendments of the Acts now regulating these industries, and in alterations of the criminal law as applicable to the negligence of employers. I am not saying now whether that is desirable or not, but it is in that direction, and that direction alone, that you can secure any strengthening of the preventive system at present in force. [Cheers.] And I think it has been a fatal mistake which has been made by my right hon. Friend opposite, and which is still made—generally, however, I believe, by Gentlemen who have not been themselves connected with any industrial employment whatsoever—the mistake that you can, by punishing the employers, prevent the majority of those accidents, and that you can do so by laying on the employer a pecuniary liability. The first answer, of course, to that is that every pecuniary liability—and the greater the pecuniary liability the more this will be true—can be covered by insurance, and although, as has been pointed out, insurance companies may exercise some control, and will do so in the shape of alterations of rates in accordance with the scale of risk, yet undoubtedly the moment you have insurance you get rid of that personal feeling of liability which it has been the object of my right hon. Friend to secure. It has been said that this Bill provides for a greater number of accidents, and that therefore it is more certain insurance will be resorted to. The case is exactly the reverse, because, except in certain cases where accidents occur of a wholesale character, such as mines, I believe that with regard to all other employments it will be in the interests of the employer not to insure under our Bill, because the liability is fixed and definite, and because it will be cheaper for them to provide the insurance themselves rather than to swell the profits of an insurance company. In the case of the Bill of my right hon. Friend opposite the liability was indefinite, and the risks were so great that a wise man would not attempt to take them. But in our case, with a definite liability which in most cases will be extremely small, I do not believe there will be such general insurance as most speakers have imagined. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary spoke of liability in the case of very dangerous industries. I believe that coal mining is the most dangerous industry, and even in that case the maximum cost of the liability is not likely to exceed 1 per cent. on the wages. But when you come to the ordinary industrial manufactures and engineering employment, such as the textile manufactures of Yorkshire and Lancashire, the cost is very much less than that, and I believe it will be measured by 1s. or 2s. per cent. on the wages, and I say that not without some inquiry into the subject, because I have been favoured by large manufacturers with the whole Returns for years past of the accidents which have taken place in their works, and I have made calculations in regard to the different forms of industry, and I believe it will be found that in a well-regulated factory the cost will really be very much less than anything hitherto supposed. Now, Sir, I say that our Bill, even if it does nothing for the prevention of accidents, does as much as the Bill of my right hon. Friend opposite. He proposed to bring in as compensation an additional tenth; we propose to bring in an additional one-seventh. Whatever precaution there may be taken by the employer in bringing in one-tenth additional liability there must be in bringing in one-seventh much more effect in our Bill than in that of the right hon. Gentleman. I have never contended that a Bill of this kind would greatly affect precautions to be taken, and I believe that every good employer already voluntarily takes all the precautions that he can be called upon to take, but, when in addition you have the elaborate system of inspection which is now organised for dangerous trades, I very much doubt whether legislation can go much further. Of one thing I am certain—whereas I am disposed to be as severe as it is possible to be upon any person who can be proved to have deliberately omitted precautions which might save life or limb, I think there is great danger in making your criminal law too stringent, because then you have to deal with juries, and juries will not convict if they think the punishment is more than the offence should bear. I am bound, therefore, to warn those with whose object I entirely agree, but who think greater results can be obtained by strengthening the criminal law, not to make the law too stringent for public opinion, lest they should fail to obtain a conviction. For the prevention of criminal negligence we must look to the criminal law. On the other hand, there remains the necessity I have urged of providing some form of compensation for those who are injured really by no fault of their own. We in this Bill have dealt with that in a most liberal spirit. We have provided for those who are injured by no fault of their own, but we have gone beyond that because we have provided for those who have in the technical terms of the law contributed to the accidents from which they suffer. At first sight we may appear to have gone too far, but it must be borne in mind that, under the definition of the law, the offence of contributory negligence has been made an excuse for avoiding all liability whatever. What is contributory negligence? A workman at the end of a long day's work may handle his tools carelessly. That is contributory negligence, and yet it is practically an accident in the nature of what is called an act of God. Another reason for doing away with all this law of exception—of contributory and other negligence—is that we have held it to be a first principle, as well as one of our first objects, to avoid litigation. [Cheers.] My experience is that good employers do not grudge compensation to workmen injured in their service, but they do grudge compensation which goes into the pockets of the lawyers. ["Hear, hear!"] One hon. Friend in giving me his experience has told me that in two cases which he was absolutely bound to fight, and in both of which he won, the costs amounted to more than any compensation ever given under the Employers' Liability Act. That is one of the grounds on which we took such strong exception to the Bill of my right hon. Friend opposite, which was described to me as not being an Employers' Liability Bill so much as a Lawyers' Employment Bill. [Laughter and cheers.] We are satisfied to have our Bill judged as a compensation Bill. If it should be said, "You have done nothing towards prevention," we say that at present it has not been conclusively proved that any large measure of legislation is required in that direction, but if it should be so proved it should be the subject of a separate Bill. I now wish to deal with one or two objections taken by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He said that the Bill does not deal with common employment; that it does not abolish the doctrine of common employment; and he complains that we have discriminated between particular trades. Although it is always difficult to defend an arbitrary line with regard to the application of any principle, we have a good deal to say in defence of our proposal. I do not wish the House to consider that at this stage we make an absolutely hard-and-fast proposal. ["Hear, hear!"] It may be that a particular employment may be pointed out to us in the course of discussion in Committee which undoubtedly ought clearly to come under the application of this Bill. If such a case there be, the Government would be prepared to consider its admission. The hon. Member for Gateshead spoke of the Bill being so drawn as to exclude shipbuilding, the forge, the steam hammer, the printing-house, the foundry, and the roundabout at fairs. So far as I know, the Bill does not exclude the roundabout at fairs—[laughter]—but otherwise every one of these is included in it. Discrimination has been exercised in order to exclude two or three large industries. The shipping trade is one—not shipbuilding, but the shipping trade. That we have done deliberately, and we have done it because we believe that if the shipping trade is to be dealt with at all it must be dealt with in a separate Bill. Then another case is that of the agricultural labourers. On the part of such men there has been no demand for such legislation. There is another reason why I think the agricultural labourers may be fairly excluded from the Bill, and that applies also to the very small employers who are carrying out work in workshops, and that is the reason that we are dealing not with accidents caused by negligence, but with inevitable accident or misfortune, and we are endeavouring to meet this misfortune, and we treat the employer as the most convenient channel from which compensation can come; but when you are dealing with an employer who is practically in no better position than his workpeople, who has as little capital as his workpeople, there is no reason why the incidence of this misfortune should fall upon him. In the case of the small farmer or the holder of the small workshop, it is a fact that their pecuniary position is very little removed from that of the labourers whom they employ, and under these circumstances we have not thought it right to impose upon them this new liability. We have had regard to the experience of Germany. Let me say in passing as to what fell from the hon. Member for Derby, that if the German scheme were really as unsatisfactory as he had been led to believe it to be from some public documents which he had investigated, there would not have been this continual pressure to extend its operation. I must say my own opinion is altogether different from his; because, so far as I have been informed in the matter, and from the articles and speeches—the most recent ones—which I have read on the subject, they speak strongly in favour of it both on behalf of the employers and the workmen. I do not say that the system is not open to very serious criticism—that, I think, will probably be true of any scheme that may be proposed—but, on the whole, it has given satisfaction; and I believe it justifies us in carrying out a somewhat similar experiment. But it is not possible for us to adopt one part of the German scheme of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean spoke with great approval. It is quite true, as he says, that there the insurance is paid not by the individual employers, but by an association of employers formed for the purpose. The association can exercise a certain control over its individual members, and in that way it does something for prevention. But I do not imagine that even my right hon. Friend would suggest that in this country it would be possible, or, if possible, that it would be desirable, to force everybody in a particular trade into an association of this kind. The elaboration of the system, its bureaucratic tendency, and the arbitrary interference of officials are all matters which are so objectionable to English people, and especially to those who have been enabled to carry on their undertaking without any interference of the kind, that I believe it is absolutely impossible and absolutely impracticable to attempt any system of operations of that kind—["hear, hear!"]—and we have to fall back on the fact, so far as the pecuniary liability is concerned, either that the employer should take the liability upon himself—as I believe will happen in the vast number of cases—or, if he has taken an insurance, the insurance company will exercise something of that supervision which is now exercised by the associations in Germany. The right hon. Gentleman referred in terms of contempt to the provisions of the Bill providing that, where the employer has been guilty of gross and wilful default or negligence, the injured workman shall have the alternative of proceeding under the common, civil, or criminal law. The right hon. Gentleman said we had given the workman no more than he has at present. But we do not take anything away. ["Hear, hear!"] One of the objections taken to proposals of this kind has been that by introducing a universal system of compensation you made no distinction between a good employer or a bad employer, and you left the employer who might be guilty of this culpable negligence absolutely free, by a small pecuniary payment, of the civil or the criminal law. What we want to make clear is that we do not do anything of the kind. Where the particular form of liability is incurred, it amounts, in my opinion—as I think it does in the opinion of every honourable man—to a crime, because deliberate negligence which causes the loss of life is neither more nor less than manslaughter; and where that is the case all the remedies either in the civil or the criminal law remain in operation; and that includes the possibility to begin with of unlimited compensation, and removes altogether the limit which has been fixed in the Bill. Some reference has been made to the scale of compensation. I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite seemed to think that it was an illiberal scale. I do not think that will be the opinion of the House or the country. ["Hear, hear!"] I believe that we have gone to the verge of excess in the liberal in the Bill. Some reference has been pointed out that in the case of permanent incapacity it may involve a pension for life of the person injured. I think that is perfectly justifiable compensation, but at the same time it must be evident that where that is included the most liberal scale is intended. On the other hand, in order that employers and others may not be alarmed at this liability, I should like to say that the evidence which I have obtained from some of the great railway companies, where employment is extremely dangerous, goes to show that in what is called permanent incapacity the average permanent incapacity is not more than two or three years. The average of partial incapacity is, of course, very much shorter indeed. In some very interesting articles which appeared in The Daily Chronicle on this subject a return was given which showed that since the passing of the Employers' Liability Act there had been, I think, 2,590 cases tried, and that the average compensation received in these cases, which went into Court, and which, therefore, may be assumed to have been serious cases, was only £42. Our maximum limit is £300 in the case of death, and it may be a larger sum in the case of permanent incapacity. We, therefore, are not open to the criticism that we have dealt illiberally with the question of compensation. As to the cost, there is good evidence to show that it will not be a heavy burden upon British trade and industry. My right hon. Friend went on to say that in his opinion the burden would be thrown upon wages. I think that is an entire mistake. In foreign countries this risk of compensation for all accidents is described as a risk professionnaire—that is to say, a risk which is one of the charges upon the trade in which it is incurred; and it is supposed to be as much a part of the cost of producing the article as, for instance, insurance against fire, or even the cost of materials. See where the argument of my right hon. Friend leads him. If this charge is a charge which must of necessity come out of wages, every other charge must also come out of wages, and we get to this—that suppose there is an increased charge for compensation amounting to £100 a year, and at the same time a decreased charge for raw material amounting to £100, then it does not come out of wages. If, on the other hand, there should be an increased cost of raw materials of £100 a year, £200 a year would have to come out of wages. So that every addition to the cost of manufacture must come out of wages, which I think will reduce the argument to an absurdity. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not think workmen need fear this, because they are represented by those powerful organisations the trade unions, whose sole raison d'être is that they raise or maintain the rate of wages. If according to the right hon. Gentleman it be true that whenever a new charge is laid upon a business it must by some rule of political economy with which he is acquainted come out of wages, all I can say is that in that case he has struck the ground altogether from under the feet of the trade unions, for they have in these circumstances absolutely no reason to exist at all, and they have deceived those who have been content to support them. I may add that I do not believe that up to the present time that has been the experience of German manufacturers. I think the Return shows that the rate of wages in Germany has been advancing as in other countries; and it can be proved that the considerable liability which has been thrown upon the manufacturers by this compensation for accidents has had no effect whatever in reducing the rate of wages. I have pointed out that one object of the first importance of our Bill is to get rid of litigation. We have attempted to do that in several ways by the simplicity and definiteness of our proposals. If a man is injured in the course of his employment he is no longer asked any question how the injury was obtained. He is in every case a subject for compensation. He is not asked what the amount of compensation is to be, or, at all events, he is only asked very limited questions in regard to it, because a maximum payment equivalent to half his wages is the sum which is fixed under the Bill as being maximum payment that he can receive. If the employer offers him half his wages there can be by no possibility any litigation, for the workman will then have got everything he can get under this Bill. If, however, the employer considers the case is one in which justice will be done by payment of a quarter of the wages, or some other sum, there is a provision made for the workman and the employer to come to an agreement. If they fail to come to an agreement, the matter goes at once to the County Court Judge, and the County Court Judge decides without appeal. I quite agree that an appeal may occasionally be desirable; but where the subject-matter is not large the system of appeals only leads to expense, to annoyance, and to irritation; and in this case, where we desire to avoid expense and irritation, we have decided that the decision in every case shall be made by the County Court Judge, or by an arbitrator appointed by him, without appeal at all. It has been suggested that there may be malingering. I think it will be difficult for malingering to take place. In such a case the arbitrator—that is to say, the County Court Judge—would be entitled to call in a medical man, and on the evidence of the medical man decide how long the compensation should be paid; and at short periods, either at the option of the employer or the workman, a further application might be made to the medical man to see whether the workman was still in a condition which required compensation. I do not think that is a case which will often happen. In the associations very little difficulty has been found under that head, and I think that under our Bill very little difficulty will be found either. I think the only other point to which reference has been made is the contracting-out clause. I think my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead did not entirely understand the clause as it is proposed. It is a clause which allows contracting out only in cases in which the terms of the agreement under which the workman desires to contract out are better than the terms under the Bill. The reason for that is that we do not want to prevent a workman from doing better for himself by the consent and with the good will of his employer than legislation could do for him—[cheers]—because legislation after all will never represent the maximum of the generosity of the employer. I have known many cases in which employers have done much more for injured workmen than anything done under this Bill, and, if employers choose to make offers of that kind, there can be no reason for preventing a workman from agreeing with his employer to contract out.

Mr. W. ALLAN: Supposing a workman signs a paper on entering employment asking for no more than £100, will he still be at liberty to fall back on the Bill and demand £300?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Certainly. The contract he signs in those circumstances would be mere waste paper. It would have no validity unless there was a certificate from the Registrar of Friendly Societies that the terms the workman agreed to accept were better than those of the Bill. He is protected by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, and the reason for putting him in the Bill is his great acquaintance with actuarial calculations connected with benefit societies of all kinds. I think I have gone through all the points raised hitherto in this discussion. I think I am entitled to hope, after what we have heard from both sides of the House, that this Bill will be received in a friendly spirit, and, in that case, the Government will be prepared to meet in a friendly spirit all efforts made in any quarter of the House to amend it. We are perfectly well aware that this is an extremely complicated and intricate subject—complicated because of the extraordinary differences in the conditions of different trades and of the same trades at different times; and unless we had prepared a Bill as big as the German legislation—which we could never have hoped to carry through the House—we could not have dealt with every conceivable case that would arise. In the discussion, whether in the grand Committee, or in the whole House, as may be hereafter decided, we may find defects which may be supplied. Meanwhile I say it is an honest attempt to deal with a great evil—with what I have ventured to call a great scandal—namely, that industrious, honourable workmen who come to trouble through no fault of their own in the course of their employment, and as the inevitable and consequential risk of that employment, should be turned into the street, and thrown upon the rates without anything in the nature of legal compensation. [Cheers.] That has always seemed to me to be neither more nor less than a scandal. I believe we shall achieve a great object if we relieve this class of the community, than whom I am convinced no class is more deserving; and, I believe, none are more ready to recognise this duty than the good employer. There may be bad employers, but I am certain these are an infinitesimal minority, and good employers are not at all unwilling, so far as my experience goes, to put their hands in their pockets and go a little further than hitherto, provided they could secure this object, and provided they know that all they contribute will go directly to the relief of what I may call undeserved distress. The difficulty has been hitherto that there was no certainty that the legislation which we were passing would benefit the workman for whose advantage it was really intended. I am very doubtful indeed whether the effect of the Employers' Liability Act has been on the whole to place the workman in a better position than he was in before. I believe in some cases it has substituted legal liability for the voluntary liability which was more generous and liberal in its terms, and certainly it has induced a great deal of litigation and a great deal of ill-feeling. I think this Bill is based upon a different principle to either the old Employers' Liability Act or the Bill of the late Government. It is based upon the principle of relieving the workman and not of punishing the employer. I have said we are dealing with the whole of the accidents which occur in the course of employment, and nobody has ever pretended that the accidents for which the employer is morally liable have ever amounted to more than a mere fraction of the whole. Under these circumstances, if we could get rid of that confusion of ideas which seems to hold the employer liable for all accidents, and consider only that we are now doing for all workmen engaged in these trades what good and generous employers have been doing for those over whom they have had control, then I think we may receive the general good will of the employers of labour, and I am certain the Bill will be recognised as a great boon by the employés themselves.

MR. W. R. BOUSFIELD (Hackney, N.), said that, considering the Bill would introduce an entirely novel principle, the Government might well be satisfied with the reception it had met with on both sides of the House. As one who had advocated this principle for many years, at a time when it had very few advocates in the House or out of it, and as having in 1893 seconded the Amendment in which the present Secretary for the Colonies brought it before the House, he desired to express his satisfaction that the principle had now been adopted, and was likely to be carried into law. He hoped that the assistance of the workmen themselves might in some way be brought in in order to preserve some kind of economy in the administration of the Fund. As the Bill stood, no precaution was taken against malingering or the wasteful use of the money. It had been suggested that the County Court judge or some other single arbitrator should be appointed to settle any dispute that might arise as to the amount of compensation to be given. He would suggest that they should follow the plan adopted in Germany, and have a Board composed equally of representatives of employers and workmen, with an independent person appointed by the Home Office as Chairman. With regard to the case of personal negligence, he expressed the hope that where there was personal negligence on the part of the employer, the remedy should be cumulative; that the remedy under the Employers' Liability Act should be in addition to that under the Bill. This was a very obvious way of strengthening the Bill on a point where it had been most attacked from the other side. This was a Bill for compensation, but at the same time, if they could do anything in the way of prevention it was well to do it thoroughly and systematically. The Bill professed to do that up to a certain point, because it said that where there was wilful default the workman should have recourse to the Employers' Liability Act for his remedy. No reasonable employer could object to penalise the personal negligence of an employer to a much greater extent than it was done at the present time. From another point of view employers would not object to his suggestion. There would be a considerable system of insurance under the Bill, and he took it an employer could insure against personal negligence as well as against anything else. He took it that it would be contrary to public policy for an employer to insure against his own personal negligence, and the best way to prevent it would be to say that, in addition to the ordinary compensation which would come from the Insurance Company, the workman, in a case of personal negligence, should have a personal remedy under the Employers' Liability Act against his employer, who would have to pay any sum awarded out of his own pocket. As to contracting out, it was obvious that, although the phrase was applicable to the Bill, the thing in substance was not in the Bill at all. ["Hear, hear!"] It was distinctly declared that a workman should not barter away his rights unless he got something better in exchange for them. He hoped it would be possible to extend the scope of the Bill at a later stage. It would be much better to proceed by way of exclusion—providing that the Bill should not apply to this class or the other—than to attempt to define the particular classes to which the Bill did apply. These definitions would be a fruitful source of litigation, as so many cases would be found on the borderland. In connection with the Bill of 1893 he moved an Amendment, which was supported by the Labour Members, and ultimately forced on the Government, providing that persons whose health was injured in the "deadly trades" should have the same rights to compensation as those who suffered in life or limb by accident. He hoped that such a provision would be included in the present

Measure, and that there would be alterations in regard to several small points, which would simplify the practice and procedure under the old Employers' Liability Act.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

MR. ALEXANDER URE (Linlithgow) said this Bill went a step in the right direction, and his only regret was that that step was not a longer one, for he frankly admitted that for many years he had sat at the feet of the Secretary for the Colonies on this question. In November, 1892, the right hon. Gentleman contributed an article to the Nineteenth Century, in which he sketched out a scheme which was simple, bold, and comprehensive, by which all the workmen in this country would be entitled in case of accident to have compensation, with one exception only—where the accident was due to their own fault and negligence—and he expressed the view, in which he himself concurred, that the consequence of this enlargement of employers' liability would be, not to impose an additional burden on the employer, not to diminish the wages fund, but to increase the price of the article to the consumer and to lay the burden on the consumer in a different form from that in which it formerly lay, because, as he forcibly pointed out, the consumer had to pay, in one way or another, for the mishaps that befell the soldiers of industry, either by way of charitable contributions or Poor Law relief. It was because he adhered to the views of the Colonial Secretary that he expressed his regret that this Bill was not a far larger and more comprehensive Measure. There were three objects which an Employers' Liability Bill must be designed to subserve if they were to predicate of it, "This is a good Bill." In the first place, it should tend to minimise the risks of accident to workmen; then to minimise the hardship of accidents to workmen—in other words, to enlarge the number of people who would be compensated and the amount of compensation; and next it should tend to diminish friction between labour and capital—in other words, to eliminate the risks and uncertainties attendant on litigation. Because this Bill, as far as it went, subserved these three objects he should give it his hearty support. If it gave the compensation which the Colonial Secretary thought in 1892 should be given for all accidents and to all categories of workmen, it would be an ideal Bill. Obviously the Bill would limit the cases of hardship, inasmuch as it included a far larger number of accidents than any previous Bill, and it would tend to diminish litigation because it would remove the defences which had hitherto been open to employers; and every Bill which tended to remove the defences which at present existed, tended to diminish litigation. In that respect he joined issue with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, when he reminded the House that the Bill of the late Government had been wittily described as not an Employers' Liability, but a Lawyers' Employment Bill. That might have been witty, but it was certainly untrue, because the Bill was designed to remove the defence of common employment, and every defence they removed lessened to that extent the chances of litigation. It was because he differed from the right hon. Member for East Fife and the hon. and learned Member for Haddington upon the question of the prevention of accidents that he ventured to give the House his own experience, which had been somewhat extended in connection with employers' liability cases. In the first place he thought there had been a tendency to exaggerate the number of cases of accidents to workmen, due to the fault or negligence of the employer. The Secretary of State thought this Bill would include 70 per cent. of accidents to workmen. For his part he thought that was an under-estimate. It would include far more than 70 per cent., because the number of accidents at the present time, which could be said to be due to the fault of the negligence of the employer, was an extremely limited number, and far fewer than might be supposed. Further, it appeared to him the Bill would tend to prevention because it increased the number of cases in which the employer was to be made liable, and in proportion as they increased the number of cases they increased the incentives to care on the part of the employer in carrying on his business. Dealing with the argument that the Bill would lead to insurance by employers, and therefore to an increase of negligence, he remarked that in Scotland employers did insure against claims by workmen, but no one had suggested that there had been an increase of negligence or carelessness on the part of employers of labour in Scotland, or that wages had gone down during the 15 years in which that system of insurance had been in operation. As a matter of fact, wages had increased during that period. To his mind this conclusively proved that the wages fund would not be diminished by increasing the compensation. No one could dispute that the Employers' Liability Act very greatly enlarged the responsibility of employers to their workmen, and it had no doubt entailed a vast amount of expense upon employers. They had habitually insured against it, and workmen's wages had increased. He viewed without fear the prospect of a still further increase of liability tending in any way to diminish the wages of the workmen. He said, further, that insurance tended to produce carefulness. Insurance companies were not likely to insure employers of labour if they found their businesses were conducted in a negligent fashion. On the contrary, the insurance offices would increase their premiums as they found any particular employers carrying on business without care for the safety of life and limb of the workmen and without employing the best plant and machinery and maintaining the best possible order. If the employer insured, so much the better for the workmen, for if insurance were prohibited they would have men of conscience and capital retiring from business altogether, and the work left in the hands of men without either conscience or capital, or else the workmen would find they would fail absolutely to recover the compensation due to them in the event of any accident befalling them. They were now insured of compensation, and they were insured of men of capital and conscience carrying on the business so long as the system of insurance was allowed. He quite saw that if they were enlarging the scope of the employer's liability for the category of accidents for which he was liable it might be necessary to limit the amount of compensation. He rejoiced to think in the Bill the Government had presented to the House that, although they had fixed the scale of compensation they had done so upon generous terms, which no workmen would be disposed to disagree with. He entertained a strong objection to contracting out, but so far as he understood the explanation given by the Home Secretary, contracting out had ceased to be an event of any importance, because, although the Bill allowed contracting out, it only did so where the workman would be absolutely certain to get as much as the Bill would give him in the event of a mishap befalling him. He hoped the anticipations of the unfavourable reception the Bill would have from the House would turn out to be absolutely untrue, and that they should, in the course of the Session, place upon the Statute Book the present Bill somewhat enlarged in its scope, so as to make it a true charter of liberties to the working people.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince), speaking from his experience as a colliery proprietor, regretted that the Home Secretary had adopted this new method of attempting to alter the present Act. He believed that a very little alteration of the Act would make it a good one, and he thought in going into that great question they had embarked in a very difficult matter. In his opinion, what was wanted for the Employers' Liability Act was the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. Everybody agreed to that. The next thing was that contracting out should only be allowed in dangerous industries, which were working under a safety Act, and the next was that it should not be a condition of employment, but that it should be voluntary. A colliery belonging to him had been working since the Act was passed with all those advantages which the late Home Secretary desired they should have, they had been able to contract out or not as they liked, most of them had not contracted out, and there had been, he believed, but one case—a mere bagatelle—from that time to this. His impression was that there would be a great deal of litigation upon this Bill. Of all the Bills he had ever heard of, he believed this would be the fullest of litigation. One thing common to both the late Home Secretary's Bill and this Bill was that they both destroyed the permanent relief societies, which were the only societies which really met the cases of such accidents without law. Under their auspices and the public opinion of the workmen that was brought to bear, they brought the man who was slightly injured back to work in proper time. If a man with a slight injury showed a natural tendency to idleness when he was receiving 50 per cent. of large earnings for doing nothing, how soon would he come back to his work? Although he was anxious to give just attention to this Measure, he respectfully urged that the proper course would be to amend the Act, and only to bring in such a Measure as this if relief societies were not formed.

MR. GEORGE HARWOOD (Bolton) said he thought the Home Secretary would have to reconsider the answer he gave as to the compensation to a man permanently injured. He might have misunderstood him as to it being for life, but the result of that might be that it would be much better to kill a man than to permanently injure him. The Colonial Secretary had said that the agricultural labourers had made no demand for inclusion in the Bill, but he thought they in that House had to consider the claims of those who did not make demands as well as of those who did. The suggestion he had to offer was that this was a Bill in favour of the strong and neglecting the weak. It was a Bill drawn up for the benefit of those who were largely capable of looking after themselves, and it excluded those who could not look after themselves—who could not put electoral pressure upon them, and were therefore very liable to be neglected. From his experience, and from what he knew, he should be inclined to say that there were a larger percentage of accidents in the trades which were excluded from the Bill than in those which were included. The excluded trades, the smaller trades, were not so well looked after by the owners, and were not so well watched by the men. In the trades included in the Bill they had trades unions, who looked after the interests of the men, not merely in regard to wages, but also in regard to saftey and the conditions of work. It was in the smaller trades where they had not this care that they wanted this protection. He put this forward, not on the ground of compensation so much as on the ground of prevention. Practically all accidents might be prevented. It was a matter of care, of foresight, of watching, of providing good material and good men. He believed that accidents had been reduced to the small point they had been because of the liability of the employer to pay for the consequences. They must extend that liability to the other trades, and the result would be that they would have a great number of accidents prevented which now occurred. They must bring the lever of this responsibility to bear, and they would lift up the whole level of security in those trades. He put this consideration before the Home Secretary in a spirit of the greatest friendliness to the Bill. Another point was as to the exclusion of women and children. He knew this would complicate the question, but it was a serious matter which the House ought carefully to consider. In his own neighbourhood there were thousands of households which depended on the labour of women, and largely also on the labour of children, and these households were of the character necessarily which would most require compensation in case the wage-earner was taken away.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY was understood to say that women and children were included in the Bill.

MR. HARWOOD said he was delighted to hear that.

MR. J. WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) said that, as an employer of about one-thirtieth part of the whole mining population of Scotland, he rose to express general and hearty approval of this attempt of the Government to place the subject of employers' liability on a satisfactory footing, though there were two or three points in which he thought amendment would be necessary. Certainly it was a most generous Measure, and he recognised the necessity for such a generous Measure. He had expressed to his constituents his hearty approval of any attempt to give compensation for all accidents, and he was therefore a little disappointed to find from the Home Secretary's statement, as he understood it, that certain trades only were to be included in the Bill. He thought that all accidents should be included, but still he was not going to condemn the Measure because it did not go so far. If the Government, however, recognised the necessity of putting all industries on the same footing, they would have his hearty approval. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife that if he went to his constituency and condemned this Bill he would not meet with a very hearty reception. He ventured to say that no man, at all events in Scotland, would go down to the mining districts and condemn this Bill. He hoped to take part in the Committee of this Bill, and attempt to make it a good Bill, which it was not altogether at present. He did not altogether approve of the proposal to give weekly wages to a man who had been injured. Supposing a man who had been injured was an employé of a limited liability company, and the company failed, what redress would he have? ["Hear, hear!"] He thought it would be much better that a total sum should be assessed by the arbiter. In the case of a fatal accident he thought it would be well that the sum to be paid in compensation should be invested on behalf of the workman's legal representative, so as to prevent the money being squandered. There was one point to which he wished to call attention. Contracting out was not legal in Scotland. The association to which he belonged took the opinion of the late Lord Advocate when the Act of 1880 was brought in. As an association, they endeavoured to make arrangements with their workmen, but they found that they could not do so according to the law of Scotland. They could make arrangements for non-fatal accidents, but not for fatal accidents. The Government should therefore take this matter into consideration. On the whole, however, he gave his hearty support to the principle of the Bill as it stood. He looked upon it as one of the greatest achievements in social legislation which any Government had undertaken, and of far greater value than any Education Bill. The Government would earn the lasting gratitude of many constituencies throughout the country, and if they would extend the Bill to all industries he was sure that the Government would become more popular still.

Mr. J. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough) said he could not indorse the principle of the Bill, because the men he represented were excluded from the benefits of it. He could not understand why seamen should have been denied the privilege of the Measure. In 1880 seamen were denied the protection of the Act of that year; in 1887 it was proposed to extend the operation of the Bill to seamen; in 1893 the seamen were excluded; and in 1897 the seamen had been left out of the Bill. There were, however, more men killed and drowned at sea every year than were killed in all the shore industries put together. On the ground of being connected with a dangerous trade, seamen had a right to ask why they were excluded. One of the arguments put forward was that seamen had exceptional protection which workmen had not. The Merchant Shipping Act had only one clause which gave the seamen any protection so far as life and limb were concerned. It was the 458th Section which made a shipowner responsible that he should send his ship to sea in a seaworthy condition. But many accidents occurred after the ship had left port, probably through the neglect of the captain, and every effort should be made by means of legislation to reduce the loss of life. He hoped the Government would be prepared to accept an Amendment giving the seamen the protection of the Employers' Liability Act.

*Mr. WARR (Liverpool, E. Toxteth) admitted that there was much force in Mr. Havelock Wilson's observations upon the important question of whether or not seamen should be included in any Measure dealing with employers' liability, but it was not a question that could be discussed at this stage. Anyone who had given attention to this matter, and, still more, anyone who had seen anything of the practical operation of the present law, must admit that the question was on every side beset with the greatest difficulties. He had supposed that it was almost universally admitted that the doctrine of common employment was not founded upon any true view of justice, and was consequently doomed to disappearance in any Measure which might be introduced dealing with the liability of employers. If this doctrine was done away with and nothing more was done, the matter would rest upon a sure foundation, and, strictly logically, their position would be unassailable. The workmen would then be able to make the employer responsible for damages for injury sustained by the negligence of the employer or of their fellow workman. In every case the burden of proof of such negligence would rest upon the workman. The burden could not be shifted upon the employer, according to sound reasoning, to prove that there was no negligence on his part; but if the law was placed upon this basis it was clear that there must be litigation in every case. Litigation between employer and employed was unfair. It was unfair towards the workman, for he did not get what was awarded to him. It had often been said that it was unfair because the workman could not fight with his employer, because one was poor and the other rich. His impression was that a jury did not allow a poor man to suffer from the fact that the employer's case was presented to them from the front row, and supported by an army of expert witnesses. But the result of litigation was thoroughly unfortunate. Relations between employer and employed were strained, and the man's position for the future, if he recovered from the accident, was injured. He was marked as a man who brought an action. From the point of view of the employer, litigation was equally unsatisfactory. He must lose all his expenses, whether he was successful or not in the action. He had to calculate whether he would fight and make a certain loss to avoid payment of a claim for which he thought he was not responsible, or to make a payment to get rid of this expense—a payment which he regarded as extortion. For both sides the worst remedy was litigation. But if litigation was to be avoided, some system analogous to insurance must be introduced, and he was glad to see that it was this principle which had commended itself to the Government. As he understood the Bill, it would give to the workmen in the particular trades to which it applied indemnity, reasonably and necessarily limited in extent, against all accidents, even though there was contributory negligence on the part of the workmen, and even though the accident was the result of negligence of a fellow-workman, and it would leave the employer with unlimited liability if the accident was through his wilful act or default, or the wilful act or default of anyone for whom he was, as the law now stood, responsible, and it would provide for the settlement of disputes by arbitration. Now, that was an immense gain to the workman, and in exchange for that gain he might well give up the right to the abolition of the doctrine of common employment. The contracting out clause would safeguard workmen, so that those who contracted out would not be in a worse position than they would be in if no special contract had been made. The Bill, in fact, embodied a kind of standard contract. That, so far, was perfectly fair. He recognised that the intention of the framers of the Bill was to do full justice between employers and employed. He was of opinion, however, that the Measure ought to apply to many other trades besides those to which its operation was at present limited, and that the doctrine of common employment as affecting trades to which the Bill did not extend ought to be abolished.

*MR. THOMAS BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) believed that the Bill would be accepted by those whom it concerned as an excellent Measure, but feared that a great deal of dissatisfaction would be felt by those who were excluded from its benefits. Supposing a shoemaker in his constituency were to say to him, "I am one of 200 or 300 employés. We make boots by machinery, but our establishment is not a factory. There are, however, accidents, and I want to know why we are excluded from the operation of the Bill?" What answer could he make? He could not say that the Government could not afford to pay, because this was not a question of national payment; nor could he say that shoemakers were not as much entitled to consideration as other workmen. Why was there no provision in the Bill with regard to employments injurious to health? In 1893 those who sat on his side of the House gave great support to the proposal that where there was a trade injurious to health, the employer should be liable unless he could prove that reasonable precautions had been taken by him to prevent harmful results. Another matter which was not dealt with was the question of sub-contracting. In 1893 that was discussed on an Amendment providing that if a contractor transferred part of his work to a man who turned out to be a man of straw, a workman who was injured while employed by the latter could recover from the original contractor. The Secretary for the Colonies had said nothing that evening about persons who were engaged in domestic service—a subject to which he referred in 1893. Whilst he was not sure that it would be right to include every class of servants engaged in manual labour, he had no doubt that great complaints would be heard when the labouring classes realised that only a few trades had been included in the purview of the Bill. Why, he wished to know, was the honest sailor left out in the cold? [" Hear, hear ! "] Another question that would be asked was why the Government did not propose to abolish in all cases the doctrine of common employment, which was condemned on both sides of the House in 1893? He trusted that the Measure would be amended in this respect. He understood that it was intended by the arbitration clause to confine the proceedings to those before the County Court Judge or the arbitrator, but he was afraid that that provision would not prevent litigation. The House of Commons might try to prevent litigation, but its efforts to that purpose, however great, would fail. One passage in the speech of the late Home Secretary had rather astonished him. When the present Colonial Secretary moved his famous Amendment to the Bill of 1893 to the effect that no alteration of the law would be satisfactory or final unless all employed persons were entitled to recover compensation for injuries received except when caused by their own negligence, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife said it was an academic opinion which nobody was prepared to put down on paper, and which could not come into operation for years to come. The right hon. Gentleman's speech that evening was not consistent with that opinion. He had realised that evening how interesting it was to contrast the boldness with their timidity when they found themselves in power. It was well enough when in Opposition to say " give everybody compensation all round," but when a responsible Government, to say " the case is altered." He would like to see all workmen placed on the same platform if possible. [" Hear, hear ! "] The principle of common employment was a technical, unfair, and improper defence, and he would be glad to see it done away with. At the same time he thought the House ought to play fair with all industries. He sincerely hoped that the Government might see their way, if not in this Bill, in some other, to put all workmen on a par, instead of creating the inequalities which seemed to be created by this Act. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Mr. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorganshire, E.) said that representing an industrial constituency where most of the men worked underground—the most dangerous employment to be found in this country—he entirely approved of the Bill, and he would have no fear at all in recommending it to his constituents, so far as it went. [" Hear, hear ! "] He hoped, however, that the Government, having noted the desire even on their own side of the House, that the Bill should be extended, would take every opportunity of amplifying and extending it.

Mr. G. W. WOLFF (Belfast, E.) said that as a large employer of labour he naturally took a great interest in the Bill. The large amount of compensation that would have to be paid would have, in the first place, to come out of the pockets of the employers, they being, as the Colonial Secretary had said, the most convenient source. The compensation could not come out of wages, and though ultimately it might turn out that the article the manufacturer put on the market might rise in price, and that the consumer might have to pay, the employers would have to pay at first. In those circumstances he could hardly be expected to welcome the Bill with enthusiasm. Still, it was a Bill for which he was thoroughly prepared, and one which would do an immense amount of good to the working classes. [" Hear, hear ! "] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife had complained that, though this was a Bill to compensate workpeople for injuries received, it was not a Bill to prevent accidents. At the present time no accident could take place in any factory without being immediately reported on by the factory inspector, and if that was not sufficient, the Government should give the inspectors greater power. The great advantage of this Bill was that it ought to do away with any kind of litigation. Every accident was provided for at once. He would be glad if some method could be devised by which the compensation to widows and orphans could be given in weekly payments instead of a lump sum. ["Hear, hear!"] In Germany an annuity of so much a week was paid through the Post Office. He also thought that something should be done by way of inspection of cases in which compensation was claimed. Friendly societies always had their own doctor, and the members looked into cases as well, so that a man must be really ill to get his payments. He thought a doctor, independent both of the employer and the workman, ought to be employed by the Government to look into cases in which compensation was claimed. If he understood the Bill rightly, everything by way of compensation was fixed, either for temporary injury, permanent injury, or death; but if a workman thought he could get more under the old Act he might sue under it. He did not think a workman was likely to go from one Act to another; but a great many other actions were brought, not by workpeople, but by speculative attorneys, and he would like to close the door to any such actions. The chief object of the Bill was to do away with all actions of employed against employer, and what was wanted was a simple Measure under which the workman could at once get his compensation. He hoped that the Home Secretary would give the matter his attention. ["Hear, hear!"] On the whole he thought the Bill was a great advance on any other brought before the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. J. G. BUTCHER (York) thought the Home Secretary might be well satisfied with the favourable criticisms the Bill had received at the hands of the House. It had been admitted on both sides that the Bill if passed into law would be a great and material Amendment of the law in favour of the workmen of this country. The Bill was not based upon any narrow or technical or legal considerations, but upon matters of broad general policy. It recognised the fact that compensation with workmen must be treated as part of the cost of production, and that as to some trades, the cost ought partly to be thrown on the employers in the first instance at any rate. The figures stated by the Colonial Secretary as to the percentage of cases that were wholly uncompensated under the present law were startling, and formed matter for serious consideration. Therefore, he accepted with gratitude this Bill, which gave compensation to workmen in a number of cases from which they were now excluded. There was a subsidiary benefit. It was clear that workmen would receive their compensation at a largely decreased cost of litigation. Few proposals were received with more favour than those to reduce the cost of litigation. It was bad enough to lose a law suit, but it was more disagreeable to pay the lawyer's bill. He did not think, however, the lawyers need be afraid that the fruits of their toil would be entirely destroyed; and in any case, when the costs of litigation were to come out of labour, these costs should be reduced to the smallest minimum possible. No doubt there were certain omissions; but if a case was shown in Committee for including any trades which at present were excluded, the Government would, he trusted, give reasonable consideration to such case, and would add trades which were at present excluded. As regarded the excluded trades, which would be dealt with by the existing law, was there any reason why Amendments should not be introduced for the purpose of abolishing those technical difficulties which had been engrafted by judge-made law on the common law, and hampered the workman in obtaining reasonable compensation? He hoped the Government would accept Amendments which would have the effect of abolishing the doctrine of common employment, and modifying the law with regard to contributory negligence, and perhaps some other particulars. He suggested, further, that the machinery of the Judicial Trustee Act might be utilised in order that the sum awarded for compensation in case of death might be so invested as to insure that the money should be spent in the most advantageous way for the benefit of the wife and children. He was not competent to express an opinion as to the cost to the employers, but when they found Members of the House, themselves large employers of labour, accepting the Bill as a fair and reasonable one, they might safely say that injustice was not going to be done to the employers of the country. He thanked the Government for introducing the Bill, which he believed would be welcomed both by employers and employed.

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport) asked whether it was intended to give the advantages of the Bill to Government employés?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The Bill applies to such workmen.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.) rose to support the Bill. He believed that he had had as much experience as any Member of the House, except perhaps an hon. and learned Friend opposite, of the operation of the present Act, and although he did not agree with everything the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had said with regard to lawyers, he was prepared to accept the statement that the Measure which was carried in 1880 and the Measure of 1895 were Measures which provided far more for expensive litigation than for real relief of the sufferings of those who had met with accidents. He had had his attention called to cases of grave injustice, in which men who had unquestionably suffered through the fault of others had been deprived of compensation. It seemed to him that in dealing with hazardous trades the Home Secretary had taken a right and proper stand, for it was in such trades that the gravest injustice had been done working men. If there was one question more than another in which the working classes did take a deep and practical interest it was this question of employers' liability, and he believed that it could be solved in a spirit of fairness and moderation if hon. Members would approach it, he would not say from the workmen's point of view, but from the point of view of justice, and from the point of view in which the Home Secretary had put it before the House, that of dealing with hazardous trades. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but he was convinced that, apart from those employers who were most anxious to give to their workmen more compensation than the law would provide, there were a large number of men who could only be brought to see their duty by legislation, which would not only provide for material compensation, but also punish those employers who exposed their employés to reckless and unfair risks. He realised that the Home Secretary had taken a very wise course in submitting the question of the amount of compensation to the county court judge, but he did not agree that that should be absolutely without appeal. One did not like to mention names, but he could honestly say there were one or two county court judges who showed bias, he would not say on which side, and therefore, unless their decisions could be reviewed, it would be absolutely impossible for one side of the litigants to appear before them. With the reservation as to appeal, he could heartily support every proposal the Home Secretary had laid before the House.

SIR WILLIAM WILLS (Bristol, E.) said he wished the Home Secretary had seen his way to exclude the doctrine of common employment. He felt that the Bill might have been a great deal better if it had not simply selected certain trades for the benefit of its operation, but had been made generally applicable to all businesses. He believed there were few trades in which greater risk to life was incurred than in the building trades, and he could not understand why they should be exempted, or why workshops should be exempted. He could not see why contracting out should be allowed at all, especially in the case of men in the employment of great public companies. A most important point in a Bill of this kind should be to make employers take more precautions in fencing their machinery so as to protect their workpeople. He was quite sure that the risks run by agricultural labourers in connection with reaping and threshing machines were as great as those incurred by employés on railways or in engine works, and he trusted, from the sympathetic tone of the Home Secretary, that he would be willing to accept Amendments in Committee which would materially improve the Bill.

MR. MARK OLDROYD (Dewsbury) said he should be glad to know whether, in the case of accidents occurring when there had been a breach of a rule, notice of which was published in a factory, the right of claim for compensation would exist. This was a very serious matter, and if claims were barred on account of the violation of the rules of an establishment, the benefits of the Bill would be in a great measure counteracted.

MR. W. S. ROBSON (South Shields) asked what the intentions of the Government were with regard to seamen. They understood from the right hon. Member for West Birmingham that a second Measure was contemplated dealing with that class of men, but he did not understand from the right hon. Gentleman's remarks that this second Measure was promised.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I hope the House will be now disposed to allow the Debate to be concluded. [Cheers.] I hope I shall also be excused from going in any detail into some of the points raised. I have only, I am sure, to express on my own behalf and on behalf of the Government our appreciation of the impartial, and I may say friendly spirit, in which our proposals, startling and novel as they are, have been received. With reference to the question last addressed to me, I did not understand my right hon. Friend to make any promise with reference to legislation in regard to seamen. As I have said, they are not included in the Bill. What I understood my right hon. Friend to say was that it was the opinion of the Government that if they had to deal with seamen they must do so in a separate Bill; but to say that we have undertaken to introduce such a Bill, either this Session or in any subsequent Session, would be saying too much. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Dewsbury, he imagined that the breach by a workman of the rules under the Factory Acts would not bar his claim to compensation. One of the main objects of the Bill was to avoid raising the question of contributory negligence and to deal simply with the plain question of compensation for accidents. As he had said, this was a tentative Measure; he knew it contained anomalies, and the Government were only too thankful that there was a general sentiment that the boon which it extended to some of the industries of the country was such a real one that others ought to be admitted to it. He was not able to make any promise with reference to any action which the Government might take with respect to Amendments in Committee. All he could say was that, making a new departure in a Bill of considerable difficulty and complexity, they would endeavour to meet in the same impartial spirit with which the Bill had been treated, any Amendments proposed from any quarter, their only desire being to make it a useful Bill and conduct it through the House without any Party feeling. [Cheers.]

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Matthew White Ridley, Mr. Chamberlain and the Attorney General; presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 213.]

In answer to Mr. CHARLES FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck),

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said he hoped the Bill would be circulated to-morrow or next day.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (UNDERMANNING) BILL.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon) moved the Second Reading of the Bill, which, he said, had been promoted with the view of remedying what he could not help thinking was an omission on the part of the authors of the Merchant Shipping Acts when they dealt with the subject of unseaworthy ships. An ordinary individual would certainly have imagined that an undermanned ship would have been included in the term "unsafe ship," but the Board of Trade had been advised that, although a vessel might be detained for defects in hull equipments or machinery, or for being overloaded or improperly loaded, no ship could be detained under the 459th Section of the Act of 1894, no matter how much she was undermanned. There had been undoubted cases of undermanning—such, for instance, as the Deeside, the Cromartyshire, and the Port Yarrock, but the Board of Trade were advised that a prosecution would not be successful under the 457th Section of the Merchant Shipping Act. Undermanning was a source of unseaworthiness, not only to the ship herself, but to all other ships on the high seas. The object of the present Bill was to remedy that defect of the law and to include in Section 459 undermanning as one of the reasons for which a ship might be detained. The Committee on this question, after careful inquiry, arrived at the conclusion that, although vessels were as a rule manned with careful regard to the safety of life and the welfare of the crew, yet that there were undoubted cases of undermanning. So far as the experience of the Board of Trade went, he had no hesitation in saying that it was entirely in accordance with the view expressed by the Manning Committee on this point. Therefore, it must not be imagined that this Bill was introduced because the Board of Trade believed that undermanning did prevail to any great extent, or that the great bulk of the shipowners of the country were indifferent to the lives and property intrusted to their care. But, as he had said, there were undoubted cases of undermanning brought before the Committee, and the evidence showed that, of 80 steamships and 65 sailing vessels with regard to which the question of manning was raised at wreck inquiries between 1878 and 1894, 45 steamships and 24 sailing vessels were found to be undermanned. The Committee, after carefully considering the evidence, came to the unanimous conclusion that undermanning should constitute unseaworthiness. There was a difference of opinion as to what action should be taken in order to put a stop to the evil. The majority recommended a manning scheme; the minority on the other hand, objected to that scheme. Undoubtedly, if a manning scale could be agreed upon which would meet all the circumstances and all the conditions of the various vessels affected, it would be a very desirable thing. Everyone would know exactly what he had to do, and would not be left to the discretion of any individual or any Board. After a careful consideration of the question he had come to the conclusion that a hard-and-fast manning scale was not reasonably possible. ["Hear, hear!"] Everyone who had any knowledge of shipping and of the various conditions under which ships went to sea, would agree that it would be an injustice to base such a scale solely on tonnage and rigging. An attempt was made some years ago by some mutual insurance associations to adopt a manning scale based on tonnage; but the plans of vessels changed so rapidly, that it was found impossible to carry it out, and it had to be abandoned. Again, there could be no doubt that if there was any attempt in the Bill to set up a hard-and-fast manning scale it would meet with strenuous resistance, and would, perhaps, lead to the defeat of their efforts to deal with the question. The procedure proposed to be adopted if the Bill became law was that, if the Board of Trade or any detaining officer of the Board had reason to believe that a vessel was undermanned, the vessel should be detained until the matter was examined into; and if after examination the Board of Trade decided that the vessel should be detained until the defect was remedied, and if the owner demurred to the course, the matter would go before a Court of Survey, composed of a Judge and two Assessors, who would decide the issue. It might be objected that that provision would place great power in the hands of the Board of Trade and their officers; but that power was hedged round by another provision that, if a ship were detained unreasonably, costs and damages could be obtained by the owner of the ship against the Board of Trade for such detention. It might be asked in what way would the inspectors of the Board of Trade be instructed in their duties if there was no hard-and-fast scale of manning. What the Board of Trade proposed to do was to draw up instructions of a more or less elastic character for their officers, and they would invite those interested in the shipping trade to associate themselves with the Board of Trade with a view to decide under what regulations ships should be detained. ["Hear, hear!"] He had no doubt, therefore, that they would be able to carry out the provisions of the Act in a manner that would be satisfactory to all concerned, and in no way injurious to the great industry it was their object to serve and promote. So far, he imagined, there would be little difference of opinion in regard to the Bill in that House. But the Bill as it stood applied only to British ships, and he had no doubt that there would arise in the House, as there had arisen elsewhere, a difference of opinion on that point. The law in regard to merchant shipping was by no means in a satisfactory condition in its application to foreign vessels. For instance, if a foreign ship carried 12 passengers from one port in the United Kingdom to another port in the United Kingdom it was amenable to the same law as a British ship; but if it carried less than 50 passengers out of the United Kingdom it was not amenable to the same law as a British ship. The section of the Merchant Shipping Act which the Bill proposed to amend did not apply to foreign ships; and that being so, after careful consideration, he had thought that it was better not to bring in other than British ships under the section so far as undermanning was concerned. He had felt that investigations into the internal economy of foreign ships might raise questions which it would be better to leave undisturbed, and would be, besides, difficult to carry out. But, having heard the views expressed from all quarters on the matter, he had decided that the best course to adopt was to amend the provision in Committee so as to make it apply to the undermanning of all ships, foreign or British. ["Hear, hear!"] It would no doubt add to the difficulties of administering the law, but it would be the duty of the Board of Trade to try to work it with as little friction as possible, and with as much consideration as was compatible with the carrying out of the provisions of this Measure. Of course, it would be understood that the Bill would only apply to ships which came into our ports to load. There would be no legitimate ground of complaint on the part of any foreign Government, if the ships of all nations in our ports were treated in the same manner as our own —["hear, hear!"]—and he hoped the justice of the proposition would be so apparent that difficulties would not be created. But in any case, the expression of opinion on this point had been so universal that it was impossible for the Government to resist it. [Cheers.] He hoped that the Measure would be recognised by the House as of a reasonable and proper character, in view of the duty of Parliament to safeguard life and property at sea, and that the Bill would be given a unanimous Second Reading. [Cheers.]

Mr. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen) said that no one who had followed the investigations of the Committee on the subject of manning could doubt that the subject required to be dealt with. Although the great majority of our shipowners had a proper regard for the lives of their crews, there was a certain number with regard to whom more stringent rules were needed. Collisions had been known to arise from undermanning, which might make it impossible for a proper look-out to be kept; and in the great gales which sometimes visited our coasts the foundering of a large number of the smaller steamers was, in a large degree, attributed by experts to undermanning. There would be no doubt as to the desirability of the Bill, and the only question was as to the framing of it. He agreed that, in the first instance at any rate, the right hon. Gentleman was justified in not adopting a fixed scale as recommended by the Committee. So much depended upon a ship's equipment and machinery. Of course, a great discretion had to be left to the Board of Trade; but since the passing of the last Merchant Shipping Act the discretion then given to the Board of Trade had not been badly exercised. During the last few years complaints had been very few, and he saw no reason to doubt that the same judgment would be exercised in the future. He supposed that the Board of Trade would issue rules indicating in a general way what the scale ought to be; and though minuteness and precision were impossible, guidance would thus be given to shipowners and to the officials. As to the application of the Bill to foreign ships loading in our ports, the justice of the claim could not, in the abstract, be contested; and having regard to the manifestation of opinion by which that claim was backed up, he could not quarrel with the right hon. Gentleman for acceding to it. But he had considerable doubt whether the application of the Bill to foreign vessels could be carried out. There would be a good many difficulties in the way. He would give one as an illustration. He believed that in the law of some countries, notably France, there was a provision that a certain proportion of the crew of a vessel should be citizens of those countries. If a foreign vessel were loading at one of our ports she might, while having the proportion to satisfy the law of her own country, not comply with our requirements. Whenever we imposed rules on foreign vessels we ran the risk of retaliation. More British vessels entered foreign ports than foreign vessels entered our ports, so if there were retaliation British shipowners would suffer most. If the Board of Trade considered the Bill workable they would not on the Opposition side of the House offer it any opposition. The chief cause of objection had been removed by the concession of the right hon. Gentleman, and there would be no difference of opinion as to giving the Bill a Second Reading, and he might say for those on that side of the House whose opinions he knew, that he would be only too glad to forward the progress of a Measure which they believed to be called for in the interests of humanity and the general interests of the merchant seamen of this country. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON said that he desired to thank the Government for this Bill, but it did not go quite far enough. Some day they would have to go a step further, and have a proper manning scale in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee which sat over two years inquiring into this question. Some hon. Members thought it not possible to have a manning scale, but as a practical seaman he thought it was possible, and, as a matter of fact, the vast majority of ships were now all manned on the tonnage system; while as to the firemen's department the vessels were manned according to the amount of coal consumed. But one of the greatest dangers at the present time was not so much the number of men on board as the way in which the men were worked at sea. Another dangerous practice was that the officer of the watch, instead of being on the bridge to look after the vessel and maintain a proper look-out, was called to assist the men at work on the coals. It was absolutely necessary for the officer of the watch to be on the bridge during the whole of the time the vessel was at sea. The Board of Trade would have to do something in this direction. The Bill did not provide for the regulation he suggested, but he recognised that it was a step in the right direction, and for that reason he should support it. He was pleased the right hon. Gentleman had extended the provisions of the Bill to foreign ships in British ports, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman there would be no difficulty in obtaining foreign crews in British ports like Cardiff. He expressed approval of the provision as to representatives of the shipowners and seamen composing a kind of tribunal to consult with the Board of Trade, and advise as to when a ship was seaworthy and unseaworthy. That was a practical suggestion and one which, from the seamen's point of view, would meet with every approval. He trusted the shipowners would be able to approve of it also. He had much pleasure in supporting the Bill, which he hoped would speedily pass into law.

Sir ARTHUR FORWOOD said the remarks of the hon. Member in favour of a manning scale were answered by his own argument, because he told them that, even though a vessel had a considerable number of men on board, at sea these men were improperly employed when they should be upon watch. It was quite clear that, whatever manning scale might have been adopted, it would have had to be followed up by a code of regulations governing the action of the captain and officers of the ships as to the way in which the men were to be employed. The President of the Board of Trade had alluded to certain instructions that would be laid down for the guidance of their officers. Might he venture at this point to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to what the minority of the Committee considered the most important part connected with this question of manning of vessels? It was the maintenance of an efficient watch during the whole time a vessel was at sea, without which other precautions were of no avail. The minority in their Report said:—

> "Every foreign-going vessel shall, when under weigh, at all times and places have a minimum effective watch on duty on deck to secure her safe navigation, and in default of such effective watch the master, owner, or officers in default should be held liable to the consequences of the failure of duty, and the ship regarded as in default and undermanned."

With regard to the application of the Bill to foreign ships coming to English ports, he expressed the opinion that the President of the Board of Trade would find it impossible to put into force any clause dealing with the question of the manning of foreign ships, and any legislation in this direction would be an invitation to foreign Governments to interfere and impose restrictive and difficult regulations on British ships visiting foreign ports.

*MR. RITCHIE said he did not wish the hon. Member for Middlesbrough to be under any misapprehension. He said that before drawing up these rules they would take care to consult with the shipping industry. The hon. Gentleman rather assumed that they were going to appoint a committee on which not only shipowners but all classes employed on ships would be represented. That was not at all the idea; but he was perfectly certain that, when they invited the cooperation of any shipowner to assist them in the formation of these rules, he would be a shipowner who would command the confidence of all those employed in the ships.

Bill read a Second time, and committed to the Standing Commitee on Trade, Etc.

EDINBURGH UNIVERSITY (TRANSFER OF PATRONAGE) BILL.

[MR. GRANT LAWSON in the Chair.]

Clause 1,—

TRANSFER OF PRESENTATION TO PROFESSORSHIPS.

From and after the passing of this Act the right of presentation to the Professorship of Natural History in the University of Edinburgh presently exercised by Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in right of her Crown, shall be transferred to and in all time coming be exercised by the curators of the said University appointed under the provisions of section thirteen of the Universities (Scotland) Act 1858; and the right of presentation to the Professorship of Botany in the said University presently exercised by the said curators shall be transferred to and in all time coming be exercised by Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, in right of her Crown.

Sir Arthur Forwood.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) said he did not intend to oppose the Bill, but he should like to know if the Lord Advocate could give them the relative amounts of the Chairs that were transferred.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire) said he could not give the exact figures, but the parties concerned considered the bargain a fair one.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2,—

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the Edinburgh University (Transfer of Patronage) Act 1897.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported without Amendment; read the Third time, and passed.

METROPOLITAN AND OTHER POLICE COURTS BILL.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley) moved, "That the Bill be now read a Second time." He said it was practically the same Measure as was introduced by the late Government in 1895, and not proceeded with for want of time. It was introduced by the present Government last Session, and was again postponed, partly for want of time and partly because the London County Council wished for further time to consider it. One of the provisions of the Bill was to do away with the limit imposed on the salaries of clerks of the police courts by an Act of 1839. That limit had inflicted great injustice on those clerks, because it had kept their salaries at an amount which by common consent was far too low. Departmental Committees had recommended that they should be raised, and the Treasury, though willing, was barred by the old Act. The Bill also proposed to transfer the whole charge of the police courts to the Metropolitan Police Fund. At present the Receiver had charge of the police stations, and the Office of Works of the police courts. This dual management of property and mixed jurisdiction gave rise to much confusion, and it was proposed by the Bill to place the whole of the property of courts and stations under the Receiver. The Bill also proposed to throw the whole charge of maintenance of the courts on the Police Fund, while under the fourth clause, borrowing powers were given in order to carry out certain works in connection with the courts. It was thought inadvisable to lay out much money on leasehold property, and therefore the borrowing powers were given in order that the Receiver in all cases might acquire the freehold of the courts. The expenses entailed by the Bill would be about £6,400, or nearly £200 more than was laid down by the London County Council in 1894, when it was proposed to transfer the police courts. The officials of the Home Office thought that £6,400 would amply repay the deficiency which would be thrown on the Police Fund by this portion of the Bill. The Government were most anxious that the ratepayers should not suffer in any way by this transaction, and had agreed to pay £7,000 per annum into the police fund in respect of the services rendered by the police to the House of Commons. The police employed in the parks, at museums, in dockyards, had always been similarly paid for, but hitherto there had only been a trifling payment of £400 for police services in connection with that House. The sum of £7,000 was not mentioned in the Bill, because it might have to be increased in extra long sessions and slightly diminished in very short ones. There was also a debt of about £8,000 from the Police Fund of the Treasury on account of the Bow-street buildings, and this debt the Treasury had consented to cancel. Altogether the Treasury had been very liberal in regard to the Police Fund, and very careful that no extra burden should be imposed on the ratepayers. The London County Council had issued a memorandum saying that certain districts in the Metropolitan police area, but outside London, were, from their point of view, hardly dealt with by this Bill. But supposing that those districts had to pay the whole of the deficiency of £6,500, the burden upon them would come to just 1-25th of a penny in the pound, so that a man living in a £100 house would pay only 4d. a year on account of this alteration. But when the £7,000 was paid into the Police Fund it would stand in a better position than before, and there would be no financial burden on the ratepayers of any kind. The memorandum went on to speak about the undesirability of placing the administration of a sum of £30,000 in the hands of the Commissioners, the suggestion being that the change would lead to expense. Considering, however, that the Receiver had already the management of a turnover of £2,000,000 a year, it was difficult to understand what disadvantage could accrue from his administration of an additional sum of £30,000. Since 1868 there had been no increase in the police rate, and very few local authorities could say the same thing in regard to the cost of any work intrusted to them. In this memorandum a deficiency of £8,525 was shown, but charges were entered which never could be put on the Police Fund. For instance, an item of £3,500 was entered for pensions, including magistrates' pensions, which were charged on the Consolidated Fund. The memorandum also stated that the Receiver had an accumulation every year of revenue, and had a very large sum in hand. It was true that at certain seasons of the year the Receiver had a very large balance in hand, when the rates came in, but at other times he had hardly any balance at all. The reserve on March 31 was no less than £346,000. In December it was only £5,000, and at some periods of the year the Receiver actually had a deficiency, so that all the talk about his having a large sum permanently in hand fell to the ground. There was only one sum mentioned in the memorandum to which the Police Fund was entitled, and that was to payment for the use of Bow-street Police Court for Imperial purposes. As the Court was used for extradition cases and other purposes by the Government, he was inclined to think the Government should pay something for it, and he had no doubt that if the matter was represented to the Treasury they would make an addition to the £7,000 for that purpose. He understood the Bill was to be opposed on the ground that it would increase the rates, and the hon. Member for Glasgow, he believed, opposed it on the ground that London was treated too well. The hon. Member ought to support the Bill, because from his point of view it was a step in the right direction, seeing it took the expenses of the police courts from the Exchequer and placed them upon the rates. At any rate, the ratepayers in the County of London and in the Metropolitan police area would not lose by the bargain.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) rose to move the rejection of the Bill. He hoped the House would not be misled by the ingenious sophistries of the right hon. Gentleman. This was not a Party question, for indeed, in matters affecting the metropolis, London Members never held themselves bound by party considerations. [Ironical cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman used an expression which was distinctly misleading. He said this was a proposal to transfer a charge from the Police Fund. But what was the Police Fund? The fund was supplied by rates drawn from the pockets of the ratepayers, and therefore this was a proposal to transfer a charge from the Exchequer to the ratepayers, not of London alone, but of the great area which was called the Metropolitan Police District. Now, when they transferred a charge, it followed that they should also transfer the control, but in this case they were transferring a charge without giving the ratepayers any more control than they possessed now; indeed, they would have rather less control, because the First Commissioner of Works was in this House, whereas the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police was not. London Members contended that London was unfairly treated in regard to Imperial grants, and it was not just that before that question had been decided or considered by the Royal Commission an additional charge should be put upon the ratepayers. At all events this stood out very prominently in the right hon. Gentleman's statement that an additional charge was to be laid by the Bill upon the ratepayers of the Metropolitan Police District. It was impossible to estimate even approximately the additional charge which the Bill would lay upon those ratepayers. As the right hon. Gentleman said, at the present moment the charges were very materially restricted by statute, and the restrictions the Bill proposed to remove. There was a Statute which limited the salary of the chief clerk of each Metropolitan police court to £500, and that of the second clerk to £300. Those salaries were inadequate, but that fact only strengthened his argument that the additional charge which would be involved by removing the statutory bar would be a very large charge. He believed it would ultimately, if not immediately, be a charge of something between £10,000 and £15,000 a year. There was another statutory bar. At present the borrowing powers for buildings in respect of these courts was £500,000; this Bill proposed to give additional borrowing powers to the extent of £200,000, and the right hon. Gentleman himself clearly showed that the Government had in view a very large expenditure upon buildings and upon the enfranchisement of leaseholders. How was the money to be provided? The inequity would be very great as regarded the districts surrounding the metropolis—as regarded large parts of Surrey, Kent, and other metropolitan counties. The right hon. Gentleman made a merit of the fact that during the last few years the Metropolitan Police Rate had not been raised. It had not been raised for the reason that at the beginning of the period to which the right hon. Gentleman referred it was at its statutory maximum. As a matter of fact the effect of a recent Act was practically to allow the rate to be raised. The old Acts limited it to 9d. in the pound, but the Metropolitan Police Act of 1890 provided that even where, as in London, the police rate was fixed, an extra rate might be levied in order to supply the deficit in the Superannuation Act. The effect was that the 9d. limit no longer existed. The extra charge would be levied on all the people living within 15 miles of Charing Cross, so that a large number of persons would be called upon to pay towards an expenditure the benefit of which was enjoyed by only a portion of the inhabitants.

The HON. MEMBER was speaking at midnight, when the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

VOLUNTEERS BILL.

On the order for Committee,

*MR. SPEAKER ruled that the following Instruction, standing in the name of Mr. Pickersgill, was invalid on the ground that its object could be attained by an Amendment:

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert provisions regulating and restricting imprisonment in default of payment of the fines to which the Bill relates."

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 1:—

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday.

DANGEROUS PERFORMANCES BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

SUPPLY [30TH APRIL].

Resolutions reported.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I object.

CLASS III.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £43,177, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries of the Law Officers' Department; the salaries and expenses of the Department of the Solicitor for the Affairs of Her Majesty's Treasury, Queen's Proctor, and Director of Public Prosecutions; the costs of prosecutions, of other legal proceedings, and of Parliamentary agency."

DR. TANNER: I object.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member not to interrupt the business of the House in that manner. He cannot object to Report of Supply.

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £22,300, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for certain miscellaneous legal expenses."

3. "That a sum, not exceeding £204,451, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for such of the salaries and expenses of the Supreme Court of Judicature as are not charged on the Consolidated Fund."

4. "That a sum, not exceeding £5,177, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Office of the Land Registry."

On the Order for Committee being read,

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) rose to move:—

> "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to confer the franchise upon persons occupying as tenants compartments similar to those mentioned in the Bill."

MR. SPEAKER said the Bill related to the Service Franchise only, whilst the Instruction proposed to alter another franchise, and it was therefore outside the scope of the Bill.

Bill considered in Committee:—

Dr. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) moved to report progress.

Sir J. BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich) appealed to the hon. Member to withdraw his objection, as the Bill was of a non-contentious character.

Mr. KNOX said that as his Instruction had been ruled out of order, the Bill could not be said to be non-contentious, and he thought it would be impossible for the hon. Member to get it through.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

IMPROVED HARBOUR ACCOMMODATION (COASTS OF SCOTLAND).

Sir WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): To call attention to the urgent need for Improved Harbour Accommodation for fishermen on the coasts of Scotland; and to move, "That, looking to the dangers now arising to the lives and property of fishermen from insufficient harbour accommodation, and looking to the admitted inadequacy of the present grant for fishery harbours, Her Majesty's Government should assign to the Scottish Fishery Board public funds sufficient to meet this need, and should readjust the financial relations between the Treasury and the Scottish fishing industry on a basis not less favourable than that existing at the beginning of the century."—[Tuesday, 1st June.]

MINING ROYALTIES.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): To call attention to the subject of Mining Royalties, and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 1st June.]

EDUCATION (WALES).

Mr. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): To call attention to the subject of Welsh Education, and to move a Resolution.—[Tuesday, 1st June.]

QUESTIONS.

WARDEN ESTATE (SNEEM, CO. KERRY).

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) how many tenants on the Warden Estate at Sneem, in the County of Kerry, have lost their rights under the Land Acts through proceedings instituted against them for arrears of rent; (2) whether he is aware that an eviction decree was obtained at the late Kerry Assizes against a tenant on the Warden property named O'Sullivan because he gave shelter to an evicted tenant named Neill, that this is the third time that Neill has been evicted, and that the poor rates in the division have been raised 30 per cent. owing to the large number of evictions; (3) whether his attention has been directed to the result of the late election of a Poor Law Guardian for the district, in which Mr. Warden was defeated by 98 votes to 19; and (4) whether, in view of the serious condition of the district, the Irish Government will remonstrate with Mr. Warden with regard to the treatment of his tenants?

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): The Government has no information on the subject of the first paragraph, and no effective means of obtaining it. It is the fact that an eviction decree was recently obtained against O'Sullivan, but according to the information before me, every other statement in the second and third paragraphs is inaccurate. The decree was not obtained because O'Sullivan gave shelter to an evicted tenant named O'Neill. O'Neill has been evicted once only—namely, in July 1894, when he owed six years' rent; the poor rate has not been raised 30 per cent. in the division, but has remained the same during the past three years. Mr. Warden was not a candidate at the recent election for Poor Law Guardian. With regard to the last paragraph, I have nothing to add to what I stated on the 11th March, in answer to a previous Question of the hon. Member.

CONSTABULARY (SCOTLAND).

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr, J. G. WEIR), I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the constable recently stationed at Applecross, Ross-shire, is occupied almost exclusively in performing the duties of a gamekeeper; and whether, in view of the fact that the appointment of this constable throws an extra burden on the rates which the crofters, cottars, and fishermen of the district can ill afford, he will consider the advisability of suggesting to the Inspector of Constabulary for Scotland that no new appointment of this character should be made, but that owners of deer forests should, at their own cost, provide any protection for deer which they consider necessary?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am informed that this constable is never employed as a gamekeeper. His appointment was sanctioned by the late Secretary for Scotland, in May 1895, on the recommendation of the Standing Joint Committee of the County and the County Council.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, having regard to the fact that the average cost of the withdrawal of money from the Post Office Savings Bank by telegraph, is upwards of 1s. for each withdrawal, and that three-fourths of the withdrawals by this means are estimated by the Post Office to be made by the working classes, he will consider the expediency of placing at their disposal a mode of withdrawal less costly than that of withdrawal by telegraph, and more expeditious than withdrawal by ordinary post?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The average cost of withdrawal by telegraph is not upwards of 1s., but much less than 1s., except where a telegram has to be sent both by the depositor and the Department in London. If the depositor only requires the payment to be made next day only one telegram is necessary. For all but cases of urgent need, which are of rare occurrence, this is sufficient and satisfies the depositors. The hon. Member mentions that three-fourths of the telegraphic withdrawals are made by depositors of the working class. I may add that three-fourths of all depositors are of that class, so that there is nothing to show that they, in proportion to others, make a greater use of the telegraph for withdrawing money. The Postmaster General does not think it necessary or expedient to take such a course as the hon. Member indicates, and he desires to state again, as has been stated in this House on February 21 1896, and on the 6th ult., that the Post Office Savings Bank was established for the encouragement of thrift, and not for the purpose of performing the functions of an ordinary bank.

LOAN FUND SOCIETIES (IRELAND).

MR. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he has received a copy of a Resolution passed by the Lisbellaw Loan Fund Board relating to the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the administration of the Loan Fund Acts in Ireland; and (2) whether he can state whether the Appendix to the said Report, containing the evidence given before the said Commission, has yet been published; and, if so, when the same will be available for the use of Members?

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I have seen the Resolution referred to in the first paragraph. The transcript of the evidence taken at the various inquiries held by the Committee has not been printed. The evidence was very fully reported in local newspapers, and, in view of the elaborate character of the Report of the Committee already presented to Parliament, and of the voluminous nature of the evidence taken at the inquiries, it is not considered necessary to lay the latter on the Table of the House.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

MR. DANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say that adequate provision will be made for the representation of the Royal Irish Constabulary Force in Her Most Gracious Majesty's Jubilee Procession?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I regret I am not yet able to make an announcement in answer to this Question.

MR. GERALD LODER (Brighton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with a view of allowing managers of elementary schools to give children an extra week's holiday in commemoration of Her Majesty's long reign, he will take steps so far to modify Article 83 of the Code of Regulations as to make the minimum number of times which a school must be opened for the present year 390 instead of 400?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): I do not think any modification of the Article is desirable. The Education Department already have power under the Code to deal with exceptional cases, if necessary.

MR. J. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in connection with the National rejoicing and thanksgiving for Her Majesty's long and auspicious reign, he will advise the extension of the Royal clemency to first offenders and other prisoners undergoing terms of imprisonment for minor offences in Great Britain and Ireland?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I do not think it would be consistent with my public duty to tender such advice to Her Majesty as the hon. Member suggests. Even if I could approve his proposal in principle, I still foresee very great difficulties attaching to any method of giving effect to it.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND).

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state when the Fifteenth Annual Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland (Part I.) will be published?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: Part I. of the Report was laid upon the Table of the House on Friday last, and will be circulated as soon as possible.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (SCOTLAND).

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether arrangements will be made that in future Reports of the Local Government Board for Scotland the reports of medical officers of health shall be dated?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: If the hon. Member will refer to page 48 of the Board's Report he will see that the extracts are headed "Extracts from Reports for 1895." The Medical Officers' Reports are all made for the calendar year and must be submitted not later than the 31st March of the year following.

PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he can state the amount of expenses incurred by local authorities and railway and other companies in promoting and opposing Private Bills before Parliament, from 1892 to 1895, both inclusive, for England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales (including Monmouthshire), respectively; (2) whether, before the Measure named in the Queen's Speech for amending the existing procedure with respect to Private Bills coming from Scotland and Ireland is submitted to the House, he will give a Return in continuation of Parliamentary Papers, No. 356 of Session 1892, and No. 98 of Session 1893-4; and (3) whether, in the Bill to be introduced, the Government will consider the advisability of making its provisions applicable to Bills coming from Wales?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member this information; nor do I see my way clear to granting the Return he asks for, having regard to the very great labour which its preparation would involve and to the fact that there is no reason for supposing that there has been any material change in the circumstances since the last Return was granted. As regards the last paragraph of his Question, I must refer him to the Leader of the House.

FOOD SUPPLIES (UNITED KINGDOM).

MR. H. SETON-KARR (St. Helens): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, in view of the acceptance by the Government of the Motion of 6th April last on the subject of our national food supplies in the event of war, whether he will ascertain, either by means of a Departmental Committee of Naval Officers or otherwise from naval experts, what number of cruisers will be required to adequately protect our ocean trade routes in the event of a war with one or more maritime Powers; and whether the result of such Inquiry, with full particulars, can be communicated to Parliament?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Resolution in question has introduced no new feature whatever so far as the Admiralty is concerned. The hon. Member must think the Admiralty very remiss in their duty if he supposed they have not considered, and considered in detail, the number of cruisers required to protect our ocean trade routes in time of war, and their distribution. [Cheers.] Every spot where cruisers ought to be placed has been the subject of careful thought. It is, of course, one of the chief preoccupations of the First Naval Lord, but it is quite out of the question to make public in any way the proposed strategical disposition of our naval forces. [Cheers.]

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (SCOTLAND).

SIR T. GIBSON-CARMICHAEL (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been drawn to the dissatisfaction felt in many parts of Scotland at the fact that certain Chairmen of Parish Councils, who have on former occasions qualified as Justices of the Peace, have been required on re-election to their office to again take oaths and again pay fees before again acting as Justices of the Peace; whether he is aware that Chairmen of District Councils in England in an analogous position are, under Statutes 59 and 60 Vict. c. 22, enabled to continue to act as Justices of the Peace without again taking the oath; and whether Her Majesty's Government would be willing to give facilities for legislation to remove this source of dissatisfaction?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: My attention has been drawn to the anomaly to which the hon. Member refers, and which an Act of last Session remedied for Chairmen of District Councils in England. Facilities for legislation will be given when possible, but I fear I can give no undertaking for the present Session.

FOREIGN LOTTERIES.

MR. EVELYN HUBBARD (Lambeth, Brixton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that large parcels of circulars, inviting subscriptions to lotteries, are sent over from Hamburg and other Continental ports by steamer; and that these circulars are then sent out through some post office in this country bearing the official stamp "Paid," in lieu of postage stamp; and whether, inasmuch as this practice would be illegal if the lottery referred to were held in England, the Postmaster General will consider the advisability of discontinuing this advertisement of foreign lotteries?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware to what extent circulars relating to lotteries are sent over from Hamburg and other Continental ports to this country by private agency for posting here, but his attention has been on previous occasions called to the fact that such circulars have been among the packets for which in London and certain large towns payment in money may be accepted instead of in stamps, and which are thereupon impressed with the "Paid" stamp. As the circulars in question are in sealed covers and have all the appearance of ordinary letters, he cannot have cognisance of their nature and refuse them transmission as he could do if they were in open packets.

POSTMEN (BOLTON).

MR. G. HARWOOD (Bolton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that in the Bolton Post Office a certain number of postmen, who likewise deliver letters within the town limits, are classed as rural, and therefore receive 2s. per week less wages than the corresponding town postmen, simply because they have to pass beyond the town limits, even though they have to give two attendances daily, returning to the head office after each delivery, and have also to carry the same weight as town postmen; if he is aware that when such postmen are transferred to a town walk they have to enter at the foot of the town class, and so, though they may have been many years in the service of the Post Office, are made to rank below those who have only just entered it; and if steps will be taken to abolish this distinction?

MR. HANBURY: The wages of the postmen named in the Question and of the town postmen at Bolton are the same, except that the maximum of the town postmen is 2s. per week higher. The duties of the postmen in question were in 1894 considered to be lighter, and their attendances shorter than those of their colleagues employed exclusively in the town. Inquiry shall be made to ascertain whether the circumstances have since changed. The transference of a rural postman to town duties does not involve, as the Question appears to imply, any loss of wages. He continues to receive the increments already earned, and has the advantage of rising to a higher maximum. He ranks at the foot of his new class only as regards choice of time of leave and other privileges, which it is only fair not to take away from men who are already enjoying them.

AUTUMN MANŒUVRES (SCOTLAND).

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for War if it is the case that the Autumn Manœuvres have been abandoned, and, as arrangements have been made at great expense to bring two battalions of Scotch Militia to participate in these, will he now countermand these orders, seeing that brigading with regulars can be arranged in Scotland, and thus economy as well as efficiency secured; whether, if there is a musketry instructor in Scotland as well as at Aldershot, efficient instruction might be obtained at Lanark; and, if not, will he explain the reason; could he state what is now the special object in bringing two battalions of Militia from Scotland, and is he aware that the time now fixed for doing so is contemporaneous with the time fixed for the training of the 4th Battalion of one of the same regiments at Lanark, and that the staff is not sufficiently complete to admit of splitting the battalions, seeing that there is only one band, one piper band, and one quartermaster for the two battalions; if it is intended to utilise these two battalions of Scotch Militia during the Jubilee celebrations; and if he is aware that neither has a complete full-dress uniform, not having shakos but only forage caps?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): It is not proposed to make any change in the arrangements contemplated for this year's training of the Militia. There is great advantage in occasionally brigading Militia with Regular troops, and this could not be done at Lanark. These battalions are to be brought to Aldershot in order to assemble there the four battalions of the 16th Militia Brigade, of which they form part. The two Militia battalions of the Scottish Rifles and the two of the Highland Light Infantry have always been considered as separate units, and have a staff sufficient to act accordingly. It has not yet been decided which Militia battalions will attend the Jubilee celebration; but it is known that these battalions are without full-dress head-dress.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING (DANISH WATERS).

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the fact that it is the practice in the case of illegal trawling in Danish waters to punish the offenders not only by a substantial fine but also by confiscation of the trawler's gear, will he consider the expediency of taking such steps as will admit of a similar course being adopted in the case of illegal trawling off the coasts of Scotland?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The hon. Member appears to be unaware of the fact that the existing law, contained in the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1890, already provides for confiscation of nets upon conviction of illegal trawling.

POSTMEN (PONTYPRIDD).

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, will he explain why postmen of Pontypridd, performing similar duties to postmen in Swansea and Newport, are paid 4s. per week less than those employed in the towns named; and whether he will take into consideration the case of the postmen of Pontypridd with a view of placing them upon an equality of treatment with the postmen of Swansea and Newport?

MR. HANBURY: The reason why the maximum wages of postmen are higher at Swansea and Newport than at Pontypridd is that the two first mentioned towns are much larger, and this distinction is in accordance with the general rule of the Service under which the higher scales of wages are allocated to the large provincial towns. They start at the same wage of 18s. in all these three towns. It does not appear that any application respecting their wages has reached this Office from the postmen at Pontypridd through the regular official channel. Such an application would, of course, be duly considered.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. JAMES ROCHE (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any request has been made to Her Majesty's Government for the granting of a charter to any person or group of persons for the purpose of acquiring any portion of the colony of British Columbia; if so, whether he will state for or on behalf of whom this request was made?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): No such request has been made to Her Majesty's Government.

CRETE.

MR. G. LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether at present there are practically no law courts, no council, and no gendarmes in Crete, and the whole island is governed by Military law; what further steps have been taken by the Government for securing self-government to the Cretans, and whether such self-government has been approved by the Christians in Crete; and whether food is becoming exhausted in the country, and desperation will probably result; and, if so, what action is advised by the Government to avert such consequences.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): In that portion of the island which is in occupation by the Great Powers, the Turkish Authorities are still carrying on the administration with the old Gendarmerie. The Cretan Council has, of course, since the disturbance began ceased to meet. In the interior of the island no regular administration, so far as we know, exists. Her Majesty's Government have no means of taking separately any steps for the organisation of the autonomy which it is intended to grant to Crete. The Great Powers intend to carry the project into effect, but the continued presence of the Greek troops and the consequent attitude of the Christian Cretans render progress in this respect very difficult. As regards food supplies, there appears to be no lack of provisions in the interior, where the Christians, in addition to their own crops, have the disposal of the crops of the evicted Mussulmans. It is only on the coast, where great masses of Cretan Mahomedans are gathered together, that there is any serious fear of destitution.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

*MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can state the result of the negotiations between the Postmaster General and the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland on the subject of an improved limited mail service to Cavan and Belturbet?

MR. HANBURY: As was stated in reply to a similar Question from the hon. Member on the 27th ultimo, the railway company state that they are unable to alter the hours of the Day Mail Train from Dundalk so as to give to Cavan, Belturbet and the district generally the improved service desired, except upon terms which the Postmaster General would not be justified in accepting.

*MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any, and if so what, reply has been received from the Midland Great Western Railway Company on the question of giving a third class carriage on the limited mail trains on their system?

MR. HANBURY: In a reply which has been received to-day from the Midland Great Western Railway Company, it is stated that 3rd class passengers will, from the 1st June, be conveyed by the day mail trains on their line, but that the arrangement will be confined to passengers booked through to and from England.

*MR. FARRELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman use his good offices to have this privilege extended to passengers between Irish stations?

MR. HANBURY: I do not think I can, because, I think, the railway company will not go further at present.

CANALS AND NAVIGABLE RIVERS (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

*MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can now state whether the Government will give facilities for the passage of the Canals and Navigable Rivers (Ireland) Amendment Bill at present before the House?

MR. HANBURY: A Report was received yesterday from the Board of Works on this Bill, so far as it might affect canals and navigations in their charge. This Report will be at once communicated to the Board of Trade, within whose province the matter lies.

TURKO-GREEK WAR.

MR. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any proposal has been made by the Government for a conference of representatives of the Great Powers to discuss the present relations between Turkey and Greece; and if so, could he state what was the date of the proposal; and whether there is any immediate prospect of this or any other step being taken by the Powers with a view to the improvement of the present position of affairs?

MR. CURZON: Communications are passing between the Great Powers; but it is impossible at present to make any statement as to their character. There is an earnest desire on the part of the Powers to bring about a termination of the war, but it must be obvious that the first essential for successful mediation is that the belligerents should give evidence of their willingness to accept it.

MR. DALZIEL asked whether he was to understand that the right hon. Gentleman refused to answer the terms of his Question?

MR. CURZON: Yes, Sir. The hon. Gentleman can interpret my answer in no other way. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

AUXILIARY POSTMEN (IRELAND).

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state if auxiliary rural postmen in Ireland will be entitled under the new arrangements to summer uniforms, and when will those uniforms be distributed; are any rural postmen at the present time performing five hours per day duty; and, when will the increased pay of 15s. per week come into operation in those cases?

MR. HANBURY: Auxiliary rural postmen in Ireland doing five hours' work or more a day will be entitled to summer uniform. It is feared that it will not be practicable to make the distribution of such uniform to them this year. The new arrangements apply to the whole of the United Kingdom, and the preparation of the contracts and the making of the uniforms will necessarily occupy a considerable time. There are rural postmen at the present time performing five hours per day duty. The increased pay of 15s. a week is to be given to postmen doing a full day's work. It will date from the 1st April last, and will be allotted as speedily as possible.

MONAGHAN UNION.

Mr. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland upon what ground the Chief Land Commission selected Messrs. Thompson and M'Kenzie to act as appeal valuers in the Monaghan Union, since these gentlemen have had no experience and can have but little knowledge of tillage farming in Ulster; and, will the Chief Land Commission recall these valuers, and appoint in their stead others conversant with the difficulties small farmers in the Monaghan Union have to contend against?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The selection of appeal valuers is a matter entirely within the discretion of the Land Commissioners, and is not one in which the Irish Government can take any action.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, how much of the immediate additional expenditure on the Post Office Department of £135,000, and of the ultimate increased cost of £275,000, will be received by the London inspectors of postmen, the provincial inspectors of postmen, the London sorters, the provincial sorting clerks, and the London overseers, head postmen, bagmen, lobby officers, and telegraph linemen?

The hon. Member also asked the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, how much of the £150,000, which he informed the House the other day would eventually go to the postmen as the result of the adoption of the recommendations by the Tweedmouth Committee, will fall to the lot of the poorest paid class, the rural postman?

Mr. HANBURY: In reply to the two Questions of the hon. Member, the Postmaster General does not consider that it would be right to furnish minute details of the proportionate cost of applying the recommendations of the Tweedmouth Committee to the several classes of Post Office servants who will be benefited, and he must therefore decline to give the particulars asked for. With regard, however, to one part of the hon. Member's Question, the Postmaster General feels bound to demur to the reference to the rural postmen as the poorest paid class of Post Office servants.

BETTING MESSAGES.

Mr. R. ASCROFT (Oldham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is correct that on the occasion of large race meetings preference is given at the telegraph offices to racing and betting messages over ordinary business messages, and whether he will cause inquiries to be made as to same with a view to such course being at once abandoned?

Mr. HANBURY: As far as the Postmaster General is aware, it is not correct that on the occasion of large race meetings preference is given at the telegraph offices to racing and betting messages over ordinary business messages; but if the hon. Member will furnish him with any information which leads him to think that such a practice exists, he will be glad to cause inquiries to be made in the matter. The officers of the Department are strictly forbidden to give any favour or priority of transmission, and any officer wilfully delaying the transmission of a telegram is liable to severe penalties.

CANADIAN MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the provisional contract made with Messrs. Peterson, Tait and Company for the Canadian Mail Service contains the same provision as that previously entered into with Messrs. Allan, by which the Canadian Government might require the ships to stop at an Irish port of call; and whether, having regard to the long established custom under which the Canadian mail steamers call at the port of Derry, and to the close connection and large passenger service between Ulster and Canada, he will endeavour to secure, before assenting to a grant in aid out of British and Irish revenue, that the new steamers shall call at Lough Foyle, provided the improvements necessary for the prompt dispatch of the mails are made by the postal authorities and railway companies?

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Question of the contract for the Canadian

Mail Service is still under consideration; but Her Majesty's Government have stipulated that, if required, the vessels performing the Service should call both ways en route at an Irish port.

BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what is the result of the communications between the Science and Art Department and the Board of Intermediate Education for Ireland, relating to the rule under which the Board's result fees have been treated as endowments and deducted from the fees payable by the Department; whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Board for 1896, wherein the amounts of result fees paid to each school out of the original endowment and out of the local taxation (Customs and Excise) grant are separately set out, showing that less than one-sixth is derived from the endowment; and whether, under the circumstances, the Science and Art Department will revise their rule and give retrospective effect to the revision, so as to secure equal treatment in this respect to Irish and English schools?

SIR J. GORST: As it appears that the Board of Intermediate Education are able to specify the portion of result fees which is paid out of the local taxation grant, that portion will not, for the future, be treated as endowment by the Science and Art Department.

TEACHERS' PENSION FUND (IRELAND).

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Report of the Committee on the Irish Teachers' Pension Fund will be published; and whether the Committee considered the question of the desirability of making compassionate grants of the same kind as were made out of the Estimates before the Pension Fund was established?

MR. HANBURY: The Report of the Committee and the Treasury Minute upon it were presented yesterday. Up to the Act of 1879 compassionate grants were made out of the Estimates to two sets of teachers—those who retired on account of age and long service and those who broke down in health at an earlier age. From 1879 pensions have, as a rule, taken the place of gratuities in the case of retirement from age or long service, and gratuities have been reserved for cases of retirement from ill health. Both the pensions and the gratuities have been charged on the Teachers' Pension Fund. A few teachers, however, who did not come within the terms of the Act, have received gratuities instead of pensions on retirement for age or long service; and the charge for these is still borne on the Estimates, and will continue to be so borne. The Committee considered the question mentioned by the hon. Member so far as regards the existing gratuities on retirement by reason of ill-health, and recommended a modification of the system which will be found in Paragraph 10 of the Report.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND).

MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when he will be able to state the sum of money which he will propose to be applied for educational purposes in Scotland, the basis on which it is to be calculated, and the method in which it is to be applied for those purposes?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I hope to be able in the course of next week to move a Resolution for the introduction of a Bill relating to education in Scotland, and will take that opportunity to deal with the matter referred to in the Question.

POSTAL REFORM.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he could give the probable date when the valuable postal reforms promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be brought into operation? ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. HANBURY: The extension of rural post deliveries must be a work of time, and the reduction of the foreign and colonial rate must depend upon the decision of the Postal Union Congress, and in any case could not be brought into operation until 1898. The Postmaster General hopes to bring the other changes into operation on Jubilee Day. [Cheers.]

EARTHQUAKE (WEST INDIES).

MR. J. WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) asked whether the Secretary for the Colonies had any information as to the earthquake in the West Indies?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I observed in the newspapers statements that an earthquake had taken place in the West Indies, and that there was some serious loss both of life and property in some of the English islands. I telegraphed to the Governor and I have received the following reply:—"In answer to telegram of May 3, no reports of casualties in the colony"—that refers to the whole of the Leeward Islands—"but loss of life and property in Guadeloupe," which is one of the French islands.

MOTIONS.

FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the law relating to Fisheries in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seton-Karr, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Dane, and Mr. Roche; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 216.]

JURORS' EXPENSES.

Bill to provide for the payment of the expenses of Jurors attending Assizes and Quarter Sessions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Lloyd Morgan, Mr. Wharton, Mr. Abel Thomas, Mr. Hutton, and Mr. Howell; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday 19th May, and to be printed.—[Bill 217.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HABITUAL OFFENDERS AND ADULT REFORMATORIES.

*SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton) rose to move:—

> "That, in view of the increasing ratio of habitual offenders and misdemeanants in our prison population, the inadequacy of the existing law to deter or reform them, the cost involved in their repeated imprisonments, and their demoralising influence upon the community, this House considers the institution of adult reformatories for their special treatment, as recommended by the recent Departmental Committee on Habitual Offenders (Scotland), to be a matter deserving the early attention of Her Majesty's Government."

He said that the existence of a mass of petty criminals in the community was a source of great demoralisation and danger, for it was from the ranks of these petty misdemeanants and offenders that the army of more desperate crime was constantly recruited. This subject had attracted the attention of the departments concerned with the administration of the law, and in 1894 two departmental Committees were appointed to investigate the subject, one by the then Home Secretary, of which the right hon. Member for West Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone) was Chairman, and the other by the Secretary for Scotland, Sir George Trevelyan, over which he himself had the honour to preside. The English Committee was directed to inquire into a number of matters of prison administration in England, and among them was the question of the prison discipline of habitual criminals, while the Scotch Committee had its attention directed primarily to the question of the alleged increase of habitual offenders, vagrants, beggars and inebriates in Scotland, and the inadequacy of the existing law for dealing with them, and was invited to make suggestions for reforms calculated to deal with the evil. The result of this Scotch Committee's investigations showed that there had been an increase in the number of habitual offenders within the five years preceding the Committee's appointment, the years 1889 to 1894—as indicated by the number of persons sent to prison ten times and upwards in one year. The number had increased by 14 per cent. There appeared to have been an even larger increase of habitual criminals in England, and as showing the futility of the present system for reclaiming offenders, the English Committee summed up the result of the 1893 figures in a table, from which it appeared that of persons committed for the first time 30 per cent. returned to prison, for the second time 48 per cent. returned to prison, for the third time 64 per cent., for the fourth time 71 per cent., and for the fifth time 79 per cent. On the strength of these facts the English Committee declared that when a prisoner passed into the habitual class, prison life, subject to the sentences now given, lost its terrors as familiarity with it increased, and that such sentences on old criminals and on persons habitually drunk and disorderly were almost altogether ineffective. The laws and administration in Scotland were different, but the Scotch Committee came to precisely the same conclusion as to the utter inadequacy of the present system to deal with the evil. They said:—

> "One result of the diversity of the law regarding petty offences in Scotland, and the still greater diversity in the method of police administration, is that it affords an exceptional opportunity of judging as to the comparative efficacy of a number of different systems for the repression of the class of offences with which we are called upon to deal. It was therefore most significant that with one accord the witnesses connected with the administration of the law and police throughout Scotland testified as to the utter inadequacy of any of the systems adopted to cope with the evil of the habitual offender."

While these two Committees, working independently of each other, arrived at the same conclusion as to the increase of offenders and the inadequacy of existing methods to deal with or reform them, what was more hopeful was that both Committees were agreed at all events as to the principle of the remedy that was to be applied. Both recommended the establishment of adult reformatories. The English Committee made rather more complex recommendations than the Scotch. They proposed the institution of a Government penal reformatory, and that the Court should have power to commit to this reformatory offenders above 16 and under 23 for periods of not less than one year and up to three years, and that the Secretary of State should have power to transfer prisoners under 23 from prisons to the penal reformatory if satisfied that the treatment there would be more suitable. Referring to the large class of habitual criminals not of the desperate order, who live by robbery and thieving and petty larceny, and who run the risk of short sentences with comparative indifference, they suggested that a new form of sentence should be placed at the disposal of the Judges, by which these offenders might be segregated for long periods of detention, during which they would not be treated with the severity of first-class hard labour or penal servitude, but would be forced to work under less onerous conditions. They further suggested that prisoners sentenced primarily for drunkenness should be specially treated in prisons or parts of prisons set apart for them. The Scotch Committee also suggested adult reformatories, or, as they preferred to call them, "labour settlements," as the best means for solving this question. It appeared to him that their plan was simpler than the other, while it embraced all the recommendations and requirements made by the English Committee. Their proposal was the institution of labour settlements, where habitual offenders and petty criminals could be subjected to prolonged detention, put to productive labour, so that as far as possible they might become self-supporting, and have inculcated habits of industry and self-reliance, and from which they could get licensed so as to get accustomed to liberty before their final liberation. The Committee also suggested that in these settlements the persons detained should be afforded the opportunity of earning a gratuity for work on a more liberal scale than existed in the prisons, with the view of enabling them to earn sufficient money with which they might emigrate or go to another part of the country where they might obtain a fresh start in life. In these settlements the most complete system of classification of inmates could be carried out. The younger could be separated from the older, and as to those offenders in whose case drunkenness formed the primary factor, they would be subjected to treatment calculated in the highest degree to break their habit. They might under the system of classification be dealt with separately, but, in any case, they would be under medical supervision, they would be employed in the open air, and trained in the habits of abstinence, industry, and discipline, and he thought they would thus be placed in a better position for the ultimate repression of the drink habit than if they were shut up in a prison engaged in indoor work. The Scotch plan, therefore, seemed to cover all the suggestions of the English Committee, and he had ventured to bring it before the House, because the recommendations were due to a Committee which included amongst its members a gentleman so thoroughly conversant with the whole system of prison administration in England and Scotland as Colonel M'Hardy, the present Chief Commissioner for Prisons in Scotland. The Scotch Committee worked out their scheme in great detail. They thought it could be carried out at almost no expense to the National Exchequer, and with the hope of bringing about a large ultimate saving. What commended it to him was that it was not punitive but reformatory. ["Hear, hear!"] They surrounded their proposal with safeguards which, he thought, would render it impossible that any but incorrigibles could come within its scope. There appeared in Scotland to be more urgent necessity for facing this problem than in England. In Scotland the local authorities were most anxious that something should be done, for in every town apparently there were a hundred or more habitual offenders who gave the police considerable trouble. In proportion to the population the number of persons annually imprisoned in Scotland was nearly 2½ times as large as the corresponding number in England. Whilst here a proportion of 5½ persons to 1,000 of the population went to prison every year, the proportion in Scotland was 12 to 1,000 of the population. This must not be taken as indicating greater depravity on the part of the Scotch people. The ratio of convicts sent to penal servitude was practically the same in both countries. The ratio of persons convicted on indictment was slightly in excess to what it was in England, but that was due to no more than the system of public prosecution which universally prevailed north of the Tweed. The difference in numbers arose from the cases dealt with summarily in Scotland—those of drunkenness, breach of the peace, assault, petty theft, vagrancy, begging, and solicitation. Such cases were prosecuted by the Procurator Fiscal, and the greater number were dealt with under local Police Acts, which were more stringent than the Police Acts in England. The comparatively trivial nature of Scottish crime was shown by the fact that the average sentence in Scotland was barely half as much as in England. In 1891, of the 48,000 persons imprisoned in Scottish prisons, 33,000 were cases of drunkenness, breach of the peace, and petty assaults. It was curious, and it was a fact not known to those who had not studied the habits of habitual drunkards, that the number of habitual drunkards, pure and simple, that came before the Police Courts was comparatively small. The Committee, in making their proposal, did not make any special recommendation as to the treatment of habitual drunkards. They thought that no better treatment for them could be devised than prolonged confinement, in places where they would be deprived of drink, have healthy work, and be, of course, under medical supervision. He had shown the House that the present system of short sentences was absolutely useless. Would long sentences be of any more avail? The Departmental Committee thought they would not. Within 20 years the length of sentences had been halved, from 30½ to 15½ days. The opportunity for re-committals had increased, but the number of them had gone on steadily decreasing. In the vast majority of cases much less than the maximum sentences were inflicted, and where exceptional penalties had been sanctioned it was found that they were never inflicted. What was wanted was not longer sentences, but a different system of dealing with habitual offenders. Another question was, were these habitual offenders susceptible of reformation? He was happy to say that both Committees held that they were not incorrigible, and the English Committee was especially hopeful as to the possibility of reforming the more juvenile offenders, though it did not despair of the case of the older and more hardened. The Scotch Committee took much the same view. In Scotland by far the larger proportion of habitual offenders were women. They were 2½ times as numerous as the men, the explanation probably being that a single false step might land them in an unalterable career; but there existed among them a widespread and remarkable desire to reform. The Scotch Commission interviewed a large number of women in gaols and refuges, and reported that in many cases the stories were very sad. They went on to say:—

> "The sacrifices to which many of these women submit in their effort to escape from their wretched existence are convincing proof of their earnestness of purpose. In the Magdalene Asylums, in which so many of them find refuge, they voluntarily undergo close confinement for periods of 12 to 24 months, labouring hard at laundry or other work, and, in many cases, supporting by their toil the institutions in which they are immured, their monetary remuneration, postponed to the end of the term of voluntary confinement, amounting to £3 a year, including the value of their outfit. This they do in the hope of being restored to the paths of honest labour."

And they added:—

> "It does seem a pity that so many girls and women should in our gaols be submitted to a treatment which appears with each committal but to render them more reckless and abandoned."

The proposal of the Committee was that when a person was imprisoned three times within 12 months and was again charged, he should be remanded to the Sheriff, who should be authorised to inflict upon him imprisonment without the option of a fine and to decide whether he should be classed as an habitual offender. If he considered he should, he would order his name to be inscribed on a register, and inform him that, if he was charged so long as his name remained on the register, he would be again brought before the Sheriff, who would again punish him, and in addition order him to be sent to an adult reformatory for not less than 12 or more than 30 months. Referring to their proposal, the Committee said:—

> "The proposal which we submit aims not at increasing punishments but reducing them, and its object, based on many years' experience of a similar system in the treatment of youthful delinquents, is to safeguard society from the injury and annoyance which it at present suffers at the hands of habitual offenders, and with the minimum amount of compulsion and restraint by industrial training and discipline to restore as many as possible of them to the ranks of law-abiding citizens. With this object we have endeavoured to shape our proposal so as to avoid initial expense, and avail ourselves to the utmost of existing agencies, parochial and voluntary."

They proposed to utilise as homes for these persons poor-houses, many of which could be set free by judicious combination, and disused prisons. There were many prisons round which there was a certain amount of Government land available for being worked by the inmates. Many habitual offenders were physically unfit for labour, and gravitated between the prison and the poor-house, and gave rise to an immense amount of trouble and expense to the local authorities. The Committee were repeatedly implored to suggest powers to detain for a considerable period this class of persons. What they proposed in the case of the habitual offender who was physically unfit to be relegated to the labour settlement was that the sheriff should order his confinement in a poor-house, where he would be treated under rules sanctioned by the Secretary for Scotland. He thought that if a man had been sent to prison four times within a year, it showed that he was an habitual offender, and that some strong steps must be taken in respect of him. The Committee proposed that four committals within the year should stamp a person as an habitual offender, and if that figure were adopted it was estimated that 1,800 persons would be dealt with within the year, 500 males and 1,300 females. Some of those the sheriffs would acquit, in some cases sentences would be suspended, and the remainder would be declared habitual offenders. That declaration would suffice in itself to pull up a considerable number of them. In Glasgow in the olden days it was the custom to turn away a large number of persons arrested for drunkenness. In 1873 54,000 persons were arrested, and 30,000 were discharged without being brought before the magistrates. But the magistrates ordered a change; they ordered that no person should be dismissed without either leaving a pledge with the police or being brought before them, and after that system had been in vogue for two years the arrests for drunkenness fell from 54,000 to 36,000, a diminution of 37 per cent. The Committee felt justified in believing that the risk of a long confinement and enforced labour would have a very deterrent effect upon a considerable number of offenders; indeed, they calculated that not more than 900 would be sent to the labour settlement. They estimated that this operation would diminish the prison population of Scotland by 25 per cent., and that when it came into full effect there would be a saving to the State in the expenses of the prisons of something like £10,000 a year, and they proposed that with that sum the Treasury should endow the scheme. They believed that that, together with the labour of the person dealt with, would nearly suffice to make up the entire cost of the scheme, but any slight deficiency there might be they suggested should be made up by the class of offenders themselves. An enormous proportion of prisoners in Scotch prisons were committed there in default of the payment of fines. A man might be fined 40s., or in default of payment be committed to prison for four weeks. The man might have 35s. in his pocket, but he would be obliged to serve the whole of the four weeks unless he could raise the extra 5s. The Committee recommended a combination of fine and imprisonment. For instance, they recommended:—

> "That in all cases in which a prisoner is committed to prison in default of the payment of a fine, the prisoner should be released at any period of his detention, not solely on payment of the whole fine imposed as at present, but on the payment of such proportion of that fine as the number of days' imprisonment still to be undergone bears to the entire sentence of imprisonment in default of payment."

It was estimated that if this plan were adopted the fines paid in prisons would amount to between £7,000 and £8,000 a year. But there was another fund which the Committee thought might be treated as security in case of any deficit, and that was the £25,000 a year which local authorities received in the shape of fines from offenders. In the Committee's opinion the Government should find the money required for the initial expenses, which they estimated at £15,000 or £20,000, but that they suggested should be handed back by instalments. Considering, however, the large sums recently given to England without similar disbursements in Scotland, the Exchequer might be a little more generous and give a grant which would enable the scheme to be carried out without having recourse to any novel proposal. The estimates he had given were those of practical men. The scheme held out every prospect of success for the reformation of a large number of habitual criminals, while it would rid society of pests which were a source of demoralisation and danger. He would like to see the experiment tried all over the kingdom, but if financial or other considerations precluded the Government from entering upon an experiment on so large a scale, he urged upon them the desirability of at once trying it in Scotland, where there was a cut and dried scheme before them which could be tried with the most cordial co-operation on the part of the prison authorities and the local authorities.

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he rose to second the Resolution his hon. Friend had moved. He and his hon. Friends had some slight hope that something would be done, because they knew the Home Secretary was sympathetic in this class of questions, and he had no doubt the Lord Advocate would prove himself no less so. The criminal classes were largely constructed by their surroundings; by the varied conditions which made it very difficult for them to get back to a good life once more. The result of inquiry and reflection convinced him that it was their duty to help these poor people, who of all classes were the most helpless and hopeless, and at the same time the most mischievous, not only destroying the reputation of the locality for sobriety and for absence of crime, but becoming active centres of demoralisation to the young, and, indeed, to the old. He thought the problem was not so difficult as it might appear at first sight. In every large town there was a small knot of what they might call the professional criminal class, who committed practically all the crimes. There were from 100 to 500 people who were oscillating perpetually between the poor house and the prison, going round and round like a stage army, centres of nuisance wherever they were, and giving a very false idea of the amount of crime in any particular locality. Many of these people committed their crimes under the influence of drink, and if they could get rid of them in a semi-permanent way they would clear the moral atmosphere, and make localities more peaceful and restore their credit for decency and orderly life. The present system had entirely broken down. Short sentences were useless, and long sentences were often worse by hardening and stereotyping the people subjected to them. It might be better if we could remove these unfortunate people to some lethal chamber, for many of them would be a great deal happier dead than alive. But that being impossible, we must consider some method of getting them out of the way, and he thought his hon. Friend's proposal, by removing them from their bad life and their wretched associations and surroundings for a reasonable time, and by shutting them up and employing them in good useful remunerative work, was the best and the only chance they could give them.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 5th May 1897.

MINES (EIGHT HOURS) BILL.

MR. WILLIAM ALLEN (Newcastle-under-Lyme), moved "That this Bill be now Read a Second time." He said that the Measure was very short, and the second clause, which was the effective one, proposed to limit the hours of labour in mines to eight hours from bank to bank. He desired to say at the outset that no modification or amendment of this proposal, in the direction of local option for Durham and Northumberland or South Wales, would be accepted by the promoters of the Measure. There had been a very considerable growth of opinion in that House in favour of the principle of the Measure during recent years. Thus, whereas in 1892 there voted 160 in favour of that principle and 272 against it, and in 1893 there voted 279 in favour of it and 201 against it; in 1894 there voted 281 in favour of it and only 194 against it. It could not be said that these figures were the result of the change of Ministry that took place during those years, because the majority in favour of the principle of the Measure on the last occasion was more than twice the normal majority of the Government of the day. Therefore it was evident that the principle of the Bill was supported almost as strongly by hon. Members sitting opposite as it was by those sitting on the Opposition side of the House. The Bill would affect about 584,000 persons who were employed in the mining industry of the country, about 45,000 or 50,000 of whom were under 15 years of age. The first consideration for the House would be what was the opinion of those who were engaged in the coal mining industry, and whether the great majority of them were in favour of this proposed legislation or not? He believed that he was in a position to show the House that at the present time an overwhelming majority of the men in the federated districts were in favour of the Bill. The principal opposition to the Measure came from Durham, Northumberland, and South Wales. In the latter case, however, the opposition was of an unimportant character, being confined to the men in one valley only, and even there the opposition was not at all of a strong character. In other parts of the Principality, however, the men were strongly in favour of the Bill. The main opposition to the proposed legislation, therefore, came from Durham and Northumberland, and even there a considerable change of feeling on the subject had taken place quite recently. At a ballot which was taken, he believed, by the authority of the leaders of the Durham Federation, on the question whether that Federation should join the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, which was unanimously in favour of an eight hours' limitation of labour, 29,000 voted for joining, and only between 13,000 and 14,000 against it, a large number of the men not taking the trouble to vote on the question. Thus, even in Durham, a majority of nearly two to one were in favour of the principle of the Measure. [Cries of "No!"] What were the reasons that the miners urged upon the House for giving them special treatment with regard to their hours of labour? In the first place, their work was exceedingly unpleasant, and in view of the conditions under which their labour was performed no one would contend that eight hours down a mine was not a sufficiently long period for the men to work. The men worked in gloom, and in what was practically a living tomb, while they were exposed to the greatest dangers to life and limb. When a man descended into a mine he took his life in his hands, and was liable to being crushed to death by falls from the roof, to being drowned by the flooding of the mine, and to being blown to pieces by explosions. He also ran the risk of meeting one of the most lingering and horrible deaths in utter darkness when, through an accident, he was cut off from all hope of escape. In 1895 there were 852 accidents in mines, which resulted in 1,173 deaths, besides numerous injuries by which men were maimed for life. In these circumstances the House was bound to grant the miners the Bill which they desired, unless some overwhelming reason could be shown for withholding it from them. The main reason which had been urged against this legislation was that it would restrict the output of coal. He did not believe that the output would be decreased. There was a great deal of evidence available on the question as to whether shorter hours really did restrict output; but there was a maximum beyond which a man could not work with any effect. A great many experiments in the shortening of hours of labour had been made. There were the experiments at docks and Government factories, and the opinion of the authorities was that the work had not been diminished by the shortening of the hours. When the Ten Hours' Bill was introduced in 1847 in the textile factories, the inspectors were practically unanimous that there would be a reduction in the output by the operation of the Bill. For the first year there was a reduction; but after that the factory inspectors, who had opposed the Measure, were able to say that the people had fallen in with the new arrangement, and that the output was actually larger in the shorter hours, while the wages earned were greater than in the longer hours. In 1892 the Colonial Secretary, speaking of the men who had to feed self-acting machines, proved by the figures which he then quoted that the shortening of hours was followed by scarcely any diminution in the output or in the total amount of work done. A good deal of evidence was taken before the Labour Commission, especially in relation to mines, and there it was shown that shorter hours were not followed by a decrease in the output. Probably the strongest case was that of the Fife and Kinross mines. In 1871 the hours were considerably reduced. The masters endeavoured to force the men to work the old hours without success, and the output pèr man had continued to be as great as it was before the shortening of the hours. The output in those counties was now as great as the output in Lanarkshire, where the men were working longer hours. It was also contended by opponents of the Measure that it interfered with the hours of adult male labour, and that the Legislature had no right to do this. But the hours of adult male labour had again and again been interfered with by Parliament. There were, for example, the Sunday laws, the Bank Holiday laws, and the Factory Acts, by the provisions of which women and children were prevented from working more than a certain time, and thereby indirectly affecting the hours of the men. In the case of the Truck Acts also contracts made by adult males were interfered with. There was a difference of opinion as to whether the hours should be shortened by voluntary effort or by legal enactment. If they were shortened by voluntary effort there would be no finality, but constant strife and bitterness between employer and employed. If, on the other hand, they were shortened by legal enactment, the question was settled once for all, and strife was obviated. If the hon. Member for the Barnard Castle Division of Durham (Sir J. Pease) had been in his place he would have been disposed to claim his support for the Bill. At the recent Cleveland election the hon. Baronet pledged the hon. Member for Cleveland (Mr. A. E. Pease) to support the Bill; he, indeed, went so far as to say that if the hon. Member for Cleveland was not in the House when the division was taken, he would himself vote for it. In these circumstances he thought that it must be through some inadvertence that the hon. Baronet's name was attached to the Whip opposing the Bill. He trusted that the House would read the Bill a Second time, and so accord to the miners the Measure which they so urgently desired. [" Hear, hear! "]

*Sir WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston) said he had always taken an interest in the progress of this Bill, because his constituency contained a large number of men engaged in the mining industry. When the House found that a demand was being persistently made by the vast majority of an industrial class, calling on the Legislature to shorten their hours of labour, he thought there was at all events a primâ facie case made out for granting the demand. The principle of this Bill had been affirmed in the House of Commons on more than one occasion, and it had received support from both Front Benches. Nobody thought that a period of eight hours was too short a time to spend in a gloomy coalpit. No occupation was carried on under more depressing conditions. In the Altham Collieries in Lancashire the eight hours system had been introduced successfully, and the wages paid to the men were as good as they were in any part of the county. In these collieries the output of coal had not been reduced.

That showed that the system need not prevent successful colliery enterprise. In the Rushcliffe Division of Nottingham there were collieries employing some 1,200 or 1,300 men, in which the system of an eight hours' day had worked satisfactorily, and the men in neighbouring districts were anxious to work under the same conditions, but as yet had not been able to obtain a general and universal acceptance of the system. The experience of other industries was that the shortening of the hours of labour did not result in a diminished output, or in lessened efficiency. The demand made by the supporters of this Bill was reasonable from the humane point of view, and was in accordance with the tendency of the times to shorten hours of labour in arduous and dangerous occupations. When the late Government were in power one of the most satisfactory things done was the shortening of hours of labour. In 1893 the hours of labour of 33,000 men were shortened, while only 1,530 people had longer hours forced upon them. In 1894 77,000 persons had their hours of labour shortened. In January this year 1,350 people had their hours shortened, while only 333 had their hours increased, and in February no one was reported to have had his hours increased, while the hours of 3,500 people were shortened. So the tendency to shorten the hours of labour which was a marked characteristic of 1893 and 1894, was still going on, and it was high time it reached the coal mining industry. Physiological students of eminence have held that it was a law of nature that the maximum efficiency of labour was secured in an eight hours' day, and if that was true of occupations carried on in the invigorating light of day, still more must it be true of an occupation carried on underground without the stimulating effect of light and fresh air. This calling was an exceptional one, demanding exceptional treatment, for it was carried on under conditions which were disagreeable, depressing, difficult, and dangerous. Vitality and vigour were kept up by exposure to sunlight. That was true of the vegetable world and the animal world alike. The nervous system of men who worked underground suffered inevitably, for they worked by a dim and uncertain artificial light. Then, however thorough the ventilation of a mine might be, the air which the men breathed was comparatively bad. The strain on their muscular and nervous systems was exceptionally great, and a friend of his who had examined some thousand miners found the eyesight of no fewer than one-third of them affected in consequence of the nature of their employment. Moreover, this was one of the most dangerous of all callings. The country lost about 1,000 miners by death every year out of some 500,000 men engaged underground. That was a greater mortality than that of railway servants, whose hours of labour were interfered with, or could be interfered with, under the law. The injuries that these men suffered were also excessively frequent. 14·3 per cent. of the men were injured every year to such an extent that they had to remain away from work for a week, and he believed that nearly half the men were hurt in the course of the year. He knew that figures had been obtained from the Registrar General's Department which rather pointed to the fact that the miner's calling was not unhealthy. But a fallacy underlay those statistics. In the first place, the average miner was an exceptionally strong and healthy man before he undertook this work. He came, as a rule, from the healthiest class of the community—the labouring class in agricultural districts. He contended that the miners, being a specially fine body of men, physically, they ought to be compared in the matter of mortality, not with the general population, but with a physically fine class of men like the agricultural labourers; and if that were done it would be found that the mortality amongst them was the greater. To compare them with the general population was to proceed on a false basis of comparison. He believed he was perfectly justified in saying that the mortality among miners was greater than that among other healthy and picked classes in the country, and that the occupation was not healthy and did impair the health of the workers. He thought, therefore, on these grounds they were all justified in calling the miners' an exceptional calling, and as an exceptional calling he thought they were justified in demanding for it exceptional legislation. He knew that the answer would be that the remedy ought to be brought about by combination and not by legislation. If it could be got by combination he would be pleased, but if it was not to be got without serious results which combination sometimes produced he should object to combination. He did not like strikes, and he could not conceive anyone who had had experience of strikes being anxious that this question should be decided by strikes. He did not want to see an industrial war to settle this question such as that which occurred in 1893. The better, the wiser and the more humane way was that this question should be settled by legislation. ["Hear, hear!"] Even in Durham the men engaged in connection with the engines and the winding of collieries were anxious to have a limit put to their hours of work.

*Mr. J. WILSON (Durham, Mid): The winding men in Durham have eight hours now.

*Sir WALTER FOSTER: I have here a paper headed the "National Federation of Enginemen's Protective Associations of Great Britain," which says:—

> "The Durham Mining Conciliation Board made a claim for shorter hours for 684 men working 12 hours per day, but absolutely failed."

*Mr. J. WILSON (Durham): They were not enginemen at all.

*Sir WALTER FOSTER: They were underground men of some kind, who have a combination of their own.

*Mr. WILSON: The case which the hon. Member states is not correct in that particular. I happen to be the Secretary of the Conciliation Board, and the Conciliation Board never made a claim for these men at all.

*Sir WALTER FOSTER said that so far as he was informed there were a number of underground men who wanted eight hours a day and had tried unsuccessfully to get it by combination. He did not think that his Friends who opposed the Bill would deny that the ideal condition would be that the younger workers should have the eight hours a day as well as the men who had the shorter hours of work at the face. ["Hear, hear!"] He could not think for a moment that they were so little open to argument and so litle inspired by the dictates of humanity that they would not try to reduce the hours of the young people underground. He believed that the future population of Durham and Northumberland would be the better, morally and physically, if the younger workers had shortened hours underground. There was yet another point. In all cases the effect of shorter hours of labour was beneficial to the general tone, physically and intellectually, of the persons employed, and apart from the considerations of trade, looking at it from the higher and better platform of the national advantage, he believed it would be a benefit if the whole mining population of this country had shorter hours of labour underground. Individually the men would have more leisure for their improvement. Some people might say that they would have more leisure for amusements that were not always of a highly intellectual or desirable kind. He did not believe that for a moment. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought that wherever shorter hours had been given there had always been an improvement of the moral as well as the intellectual tone of the population. ["Hear, hear!"] In no part of the country had the University extension system produced more good than it had in the counties of Durham and Northumberland amongst the miners, who had taken advantage of these opportunities of improving their mental condition. They had only to look at the representatives of those districts to see that they were an exceptional race of men—["hear, hear!"]—and he wanted an exceptional race of men to come from other parts of the country. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] He believed that if this Bill were adopted, any difficulty or danger in the way of diminution of output would be met at once by the greater regularity with which miners would discharge their work. At all events, he would ask his hon. Friends who were connected with the northern counties to pause before they used their voices and votes in opposition to this Measure. He believed that if they supported the Bill they would do much to advance the general condition of the mining population, not only materially, but morally and intellectually. In his opinion, the Bill was based on principles of justice and fairness, and he maintained and believed that it could be passed not only without danger to the great industry it affected, but even for the general welfare and intellectual and moral improvement of the men engaged in it. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Sir ELLIOTT LEES (Birkenhead) said that as an Amendment stood on the Paper in his name to the effect that, unless the public safety be involved, the House declined to interfere with the freedom of grown-up men in regard to the disposal of their labour, the House would understand that he was one of those very old-fashioned people who disputed the right of Parliament to interfere with grown-up men in the disposal of their labour. As to the case of Sunday labour, everyone knew that their Sunday laws dated many years back, and were based upon religious grounds. The hon. Member quoted the Truck Act, but there they did not interfere with a man's right to sell his labour as he pleased. All they did was to interfere with the currency paid for his labour. Reference was also made to the Act recently passed as to the control of railway workers, but that Act was passed on the excuse that the safety of the public was involved. He knew from personal experience that many railway servants very bitterly resented the interference with their right to dispose of their labour as they pleased and to work a few minutes longer. As to the statement that a majority of the miners were in favour of this special legislation, he begged to point out that what they had to consider was not the view of a particular class with regard to a particular measure, but the good of the country at large. When the Mover and Seconder of the Bill maintained that miners were in an exceptional position owing to the danger of their calling, he wished it borne in mind that this argument cut both ways. In order to maintain that argument the supporters of the Bill ought to be able to show that the danger was caused by excessive length of hours. It was quite true that the work of miners was difficult, disagreeable and dangerous, but not a hint had been given that the danger arose from the time that miners worked. They all, he supposed, recognised the advantages to be gained from shortening the hours of labour; but he and those who thought with him said that should be brought about by voluntary arrangement and not by vote of that House. ["Hear, hear!"] Until these great trade organisations failed there could be no possible excuse for State interference. The miners had the strongest organisation of any trade in the country. That had been shown many times over when they had dictated to their employers. Besides, the miners had this great advantage—that they dominated all other trades. Not only the comforts of modern life, but the conduct of almost every other trade, depended upon an adequate supply of coal. This was a leverage which was not possessed by any other trade. ["Hear, hear!"] The miners also possessed another lever in that they were practically a close corporation. They reaped the economic advantages of the difficulty and danger of their calling. If a strike took place there was no danger of outside interference; they could not turn an agricultural labourer or an artisan into a miner when the coal miner was on strike. As to another argument, he asked whether, if Parliament interfered with the means of earning a living, it would not be equally justified in interfering with and limiting the earnings of the individual. They interfered, in that Bill, with the miners' earning power. [Cries of "No, no!"] That must be admitted if they interfered with his hours of labour. [Cries of "No, no!"] If this was done they might be returning to the bad old system of State interference with the limitation of wages, since if the public welfare justified State interference with hours to avoid the inconvenience of a strike, it would also justify on the same grounds interference with wages in case of any exorbitant demands of the miners raising the price of coal. Another objection to this interference by the State was that once they passed an Act it would be very difficult to change it. If they brought the change about by combination they could alter it at a moment's notice. There might be circumstances—great distress, or scarcity, or a national calamity—when the miners might desire, but Parliament would have no time or desire, to make a change; but with combination the change could be made without Parliamentary interference. About 100 years ago labour escaped from the trammels of State interference in which it was formerly cooped up. In the course of the century it had become a mighty power, controlling policy, upsetting Cabinets, and swaying the whole management of affairs. He would strongly urge the House of Commons not to put back the Parliamentary clock of progress by 100 years, and not to enter upon a course of State interference with the individual, which he believed would be disastrous to English liberties and freedom.

*SIR ALFRED HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.) thought the Bill was singularly inopportune, for we were now having sent into England very large quantities of iron and steel from America. In Wolverhampton it was being delivered by thousands of tons, although it had to incur cost of carriage equal to 35 per cent. of the selling price. After deducting the cost of carriage, the selling price would leave to the maker at Pittsburg 15s. per ton less than steel could be made for in this country. He admitted that the quality of the steel was very inferior, and that it was suitable only for a limited number of purposes, but none the less, it was by thousands of tons displacing English manufacture and English labour. The chief reason that the Americans were able to send their steel into this country was the low cost of coal which obtained there, the selling price of which was about 2s. or 2s. 6d. a ton, whereas the cost of producing in this country, besides royalties and all that kind of thing, was at least double that amount. The explanation of the low price of coal in America was furnished to him by the Member for Walthamstow, who had lately paid a visit to America, and when he came back and was interviewed by the inevitable interviewer, he said that the miners were working in the United States for wages of not more than 3s. or 4s. a day of 10 or 11 hours. Here our miners earned from 5s. 6d. to 6s. a day for an average of seven hours' work, and in some cases even less, so that per hour the wages in the United States were considerably less than half that which obtained in this country. If that were true, was this a time at which to add at least 20 per cent. to the cost of producing coal? It was not the iron and steel industry alone that was affected, for coal was the motive power of every manufacture, and was its very life blood, and not only that, but it was an absolute necessary of life to every working man, for it was as necessary that he should be kept warm as that he should be supplied with food. Were the miners, he asked, so oppressed and so suffering as to justify such legislation for their benefit. They were at this moment obtaining higher wages for their work than almost any of the artisans in the country. Was their case so bad that the community should suffer the enormous burden of an addition of 1s. 6d. a ton to the price of coal, which would come to £7,000,000 per annum? The Member for the Ilkeston Division (Sir Walter Foster) spoke of their labouring for eight hours, but no miner worked now for eight hours. If the proposal were that the miners' labour should be restricted to seven hours, he should not oppose it, for he thought that was quite long enough for a collier to work; but the proposal was that he should not be in the pit more than eight hours. Perfect confusion would prevail in the working of the different collieries if the proposal were adopted, for some collieries have to send down 400 or 500 men, while others only send down 30, which made a great difference in the time required for getting the men into the pit, and the inequality would be still greater on account of the distance of the workings from the shaft, which in some cases was a mile, and in others 100 yards; so that it would be impossible to regulate the men's pay in proportion to the amount of their work. On the question of health, he urged that the conditions of the employment were not unhealthy, having regard to the various Acts for providing efficient ventilation, and undoubtedly a coal pit was a much better ventilated place than nine-tenths of the manufactories of this country. The Member for Ilkeston admitted that the death rate of miners was very low, but said it was owing to their being the sons of agricultural labourers. In fact, miners were the sons of miners—the healthy sons of healthy sires. The Miners' Federation, which were proposing this legislation, prevailed chiefly in the Midlands, and by the excellence of their organisation they had contrived to keep up wages 30 per cent. above what was called the standard rate which prevailed in 1887 and 1888, while in Scotland and South Wales wages had been reduced so that in Scotland they were only 6¾ per cent., and in South Wales 2¾ per cent. above the standard rate. From 1890 to 1895 the production of coal in South Wales and Scotland had increased 15 million tons, but where the wages had been kept up the production of coal had been reduced. The Mover of the Bill had repudiated any suggestion of applying the principle of local option to the question, because he knew that if it were in operation in one district and not in another, in the district where it prevailed the pits would be absolutely closed and shut up. The first effect of the proposal, by restricting the output 15 to 20 per cent., would be to bring about a coal famine and famine prices, which would be disastrous first to the manufacturers, secondly to the coalowners, and finally and most of all to the miners themselves. He hoped the House would reject the Bill by a large majority.

Mr. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil) congratulated the Mover and Seconder of the Bill on the tone and temper with which they had approached the subject, and said the Mover had made the very best of a bad case. He admired the courage of the hon. Member who moved the Bill, having regard to the fate of his predecessors who undertook the same task. This Bill had been moved three times, in 1892, 1893, and 1894, and of the three Members who moved the Bill on each of those occasions, not one had a seat at the present time for the division which he then represented.

Mr. S. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow) said he wished to make it distinctly clear that the eight hours' question had nothing to do either with his defeat in Ince or his return for Walthamstow.

Colonel BLUNDELL (Lancashire, S.W., Ince): As the opponent of the hon. Member in Ince, I beg to say that I raised the question in my election address.

Mr. DAVID THOMAS thanked the hon. Member for Walthamstow for his admission, because one of his points was that the Lancashire miners did not take that deep interest in the question which it was claimed they did. If they did they had a curious way of showing their appreciation of those hon. Members who had gone out of their way to promote this movement in the House of Commons. He denied that a large majority of the miners of the United Kingdom were in favour of the Bill. Even a majority of what were known as the direct Labour representatives who represented mining constituencies were opposed to the Bill. There were three against and two in favour. The promoters of the Miners' Federation required the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, and it was owing to the obstinacy of the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. Pickard) and those who were immediately supporting him, that the Eight Hours (Mines) Bill had not become law three years ago. He claimed that he represented the majority of the workmen in South Wales and Monmouth upon this matter. [Cries of "No!"] If not, why would not the hon. Member accept the challenge he had made over and over again and put the question to the arbitrament of a test ballot? His right hon. Friend the Member for the Forest of Dean claimed to know more about the opinions of South Wales colliers than he did himself. He claimed a greater degree of knowledge, because for every meeting his right hon. Friend had addressed, he had addressed scores. If his right hon. Friend was so satisfied that the opinions of South Wales miners were with him then he could not object to the principle of local option. ["Hear, hear!"] His right hon. Friend, however, had said he would rather not have the votes of those who were in favour of local option, and that being so, he hoped those weak-kneed Members would act accordingly and not seek to salve their consciences by voting for the Second Reading, thinking they could introduce the principle of local option in Committee. Again, one hon. Member supported the Bill because of the effect it would have on output, while another hon. Member supported it on the ground that it would have no effect on output. There was another circumstance which spoke very well for the unselfishness of the Miners' Federation. In most districts of the Federation—in South Yorkshire, for instance—the men practically had already an eight hours' day. Yet they were the chief promoters of the Bill, which did not assist them, but thrust upon an unwilling section of their fellow-miners an eight hours' day. [Laughter.]

MR. BENJAMIN PICKARD (York, W.R., Normanton): The miners of Yorkshire are not the principal promoters of the Measure, but the miners of Lancashire.

MR. DAVID THOMAS said that the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of the Bill spoke strongly against it at the last election, but he was "converted" by the miners of Lancashire. [Laughter.] It had been urged in favour of the Bill that it was unfair that the boys in Northumberland and Durham should be working long hours while the men were working short hours. It was an insult to the intelligence of the House that such an argument should be used by anyone who understood mining matters. Surely it would be an easy thing to amend the Mines Regulation Act so as to raise the age in the definition of a boy from 16 to 21, and diminish the maximum number of hours per day to eight. [Cheers.] Yet the House was asked to believe that this Bill, which would revolutionise the working of many mines, and affect three-quarters of a million of miners, was necessary to shorten the hours of the boys employed in the Northumberland and Durham collieries. ["Hear, hear!"] It was said that under voluntary arrangements there had been no restriction of output; but it was a fallacy to suppose that that was a test of what would happen under legal enactment. There must be some point beyond which the hours of labour could not be diminished without restricting the output, and that point had been very nearly reached in South Wales. He knew this from practical experience. When eight hours a day were worked on Saturdays, as against 10½ hours on other week days, the diminution in output on the Saturday was almost exactly proportionate to the diminution in the hours. He had wished to be a pioneer in this movement for shorter hours, and in the collieries with which he was connected he had at one time put into operation an eight hours' day. The figures showed that the reduction of output per man was almost exactly proportionate to the reduction of hours; and, after 13 months, the system was abandoned at the insistence of the men. The supporters of the Bill had not attempted to deal with the specific objections to the Bill, or with the geological difficulty. At the present time the efficiency of labour in the Nottinghamshire collieries was 30 per cent. higher than in the Welsh collieries. Dare the hon. Member for Normanton suggest to the Welsh miners that it was because they were inferior as workmen? ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] The fact was due entirely to differences of strata. In South Wales three or four times as much timber had to be used. If the supporters of the Bill would introduce a provision to alter the laws of nature, and provide that the geological strata in Wales should be made the same as in Nottinghamshire, and would give a guarantee that the provision should be carried into effect, then he would become one of the most ardent supporters of the Bill. In the meantime he begged to move to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." [Cheers.]

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

SIR JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) thought no one could find fault with the tone in which the Motion had been made. Whether they were supporters or opponents of this Bill, they all had a great desire to see the hours of labour shortened as much as possible, provided that it did not inflict any serious loss upon the general community. During the last 20 or 30 years they had seen very great changes take place in this respect, and he thought the only safe and judicious way to proceed with the shortening of hours of labour was by mutual arrangement. He had expected when hon. Members brought forward an important Bill to restrict the right of individuals to work as they thought best in their own interests, that they would have produced a very strong case in favour of such action, but he failed to see that any case had been made out with regard to miners, or to the general industries of the country. From what had been said it appeared that there was no chance whatever of any Amendment being accepted in the direction of local option, so as to give localities the power to arrange their hours by mutual agreement or otherwise. He was one of those who were rather against the general principle of this question. He thought that every man had the right to work when he liked, where he liked, and for what he liked without the interference of Parliament. That profession of belief was a very broad one, but he believed it was in the interests of the general community, and he would like to see such a line adopted with regard to their legislation. He knew that there were cases where an exception might be claimed, and claimed with justice—where it was undoubtedly for the safety of the community, or where it was necessary to make certain regulations for the benefit of an industry or those who were engaged in it. He had spoken on several occasions on this question, and he was afraid he must on this occasion, from necessity somewhat, travel over old ground. But what he would ask was that, if they were to have legislation of this kind, they must first make out a case that there ought to be legislation for the general trade of the country. If there was a case, then he said they had no right to pick out any special industry to be dealt with by legislation. He failed, however, to see that there could be such a case for the general industries of the country, and he thought there was a much weaker case for legislation in regard to miners than there was for the general trades of the country. Was there a trade which was better controlled and regulated by means of trades unions than the mining industry? He questioned whether there was one. If there was one trade in the country which was more able than another to enforce reasonable conditions of labour upon employers, he thought it was the mining industry, and it was absurd to tell him that owing to the weakness of the trades unions, and in order to avoid strikes, they should interfere with the hours of labour by legislation. In his judgment such a proceeding would not avoid strikes, and he was as averse to strikes as anyone. In the county of Durham they had a very admirable system of working by means of committees of workmen and owners, and they found that they had got very satisfactory conditions for all those employed in the mining industry. In that locality they had better conditions, in his judgment, than existed in any other part of the country. He thought Parliament should only interfere in cases where the hours were exceptionally long, and where the occupation was very unhealthy or specially dangerous. Could they claim that there was on these grounds a case for this particular Bill? In the first place, was there any case made out that this industry was especially unhealthy? He was not surprised that the Seconder of the Motion took a very strong line in regard to this point, because the statistics produced in Dr. Ogle were so strong that they must of necessity carry great weight in this matter; but the Registrar General of births, deaths, and marriages stated in his Report in 1885—and since then great improvements had been made in the way of ventilation, draining, and in other respects in our mines—that in spite of their terrible liability to accident and their constant exposure to an atmosphere vitiated by coal dust, by foul air, and by an excessively high temperature, the comparative mortality figure of these labourers is considerably below that of all males. Nor is this only true for coal miners in the aggregate, but it is true, with one single exception, for the miners in each great coal area taken separately. It holds good for Durham, with Northumberland, for Lancashire, for Derbyshire, with Nottinghamshire, for the West Riding, and for Staffordshire. In each of these areas the comparative mortality figure of all males within the area is higher than that of miners.

Mr. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): Does that include boys?

Sir JAMES JOICEY said he understood it included the whole mining industry. Then, if in each case we exclude accidents, it will be found that the mortality of the coal miners only slightly exceed that of the most healthy class of men—namely, the farmers, the agricultural labourers, and the gardeners. Dr. Ogle, in 1891, read a Paper, in which he gave a comparison of the rates of mortality in different occupations. The clergymen stood at the top of the list as being the healthiest men in the community. He observed that there were a large number of industries which were much more unhealthy than the mining industry. Hotel servants represented a rate of mortality of 397; street hawkers, 338; earthenware makers, 313; file makers, 300; whereas, coal miners represented only 160, and that figure included the accidents which they were subject to in their work. Therefore, seeing that mining was one of the most healthy occupations in the country, he thought that no case on that ground could be made out for any interference by Parliament in this question. The Seconder of the Motion said that was accounted for by the fact that agricultural labourers were imported into the mines. He (Sir James) could speak with some certainty as to Durham and Northumberland, and there they had men who represented generations of miners, and his own family had been represented for 300 years in that industry; therefore, in the counties he had named there must be a very small percentage indeed of men employed in the mines who had not been born and bred in connection with that industry. The next case put forward was that it was a much more dangerous occupation than any other. He admitted that mining was certainly very dangerous, but what he wanted to know was how this Bill was going to make it more safe. ["Hear, hear!"] He challenged any hon. Member to show him how this Bill was to make the occupation of a miner more safe than it was. As a matter of fact it had been shown that by far the greater majority of accidents occurred in the first four hours after the men went down into the pit; therefore, it looked as if there would be little benefit got from decreasing the hours to eight. He maintained that instead of giving increased safety this Bill would give increased danger—["hear, hear"]—because shortened hours would tend to greater hurry and greater haste than now. Had there been any case made out with regard to the question of danger? He did not think there had been if they compared the danger of this occupation with that of some others. If they took the railway interest they would find that accidents took place very often on the surface, and with regard to sailors, he would think that there were three times as many sailors lost in a year as there were miners, and when they considered that there were something like 200,000 or 300,000 more miners than sailors in the country, they might conclude that the sailor's life was a more hazardous one than the miner's. Then with regard to the hours worked, he maintained that they were not longer in the mining industry than in any other. If they took the whole of the country and considered the hours worked by the miners they would find that they compared favourably with those of almost any other industry. They ought also to take into consideration what was not taken into consideration by many Gentlemen, namely, that in the engineering system, eight hours meant actually eight hours work, exclusive of meal time. But in the mines, it was not a case of eight hours' work. ["Hear, hear!"] Everybody who knew anything of mines knew that there was a considerable time occupied in a miner going down from the surface to the working place. He had no doubt it averaged three-quarters of an hour each way. The hours per week under ground in certain mining districts were 35 hours, 21 minutes, but the actual time at work was 27 hours, 46 minutes for five days a week. He challenged any hon. Member who was anxious to make an exception in favour of miners to bring forward hours in any industry in the country which were better than these. The Seconder of the Motion supported this Bill because it was an unpleasant thing to work in the dark. There might be more pleasant positions than being down a mine, but he could assure his hon. Friend that men who were accustomed to it were not so easily alarmed as he seemed to think. It reminded him of an incident that happened in connection with his own business. A foreign Gentleman who never saw a mine, but who was a large consumer of coal, thought he would like to go down a mine and see the coal produced. He was dressed in miner's clothes, put on his rough flannel and was very proud of himself. But when he looked down the shaft his courage left him, and he said, "What! go down there? I would very much rather go to the bottomless pit." He turned back and did not go down. That was the feeling of some people in regard to the life of a miner, but so far as he was concerned, if he had to earn his living by working with his hands, there was no occupation he would choose sooner than that of a miner. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] Out of a hundred occupations, Dr. Ogle said that there were 70 which were more unhealthy than that of the miner, and in face of such facts as these he failed to see how they were to make out a case for special legislation so far as the miners were concerned. In Durham there might be a strong case with regard to their boys. ["Hear, hear!"] He was not prepared to say that their boys were in the position that they would like to see them in. ["Hear, hear!"] Nor did he think that they had yet reached the lowest level of hours that they would be able to allow their boys to work. He observed that the Durham Mine Owners' Association said that, assuming that the boys worked 11 days out of a fortnight, which was not the average, because the average was only 10, boys under 16 would work 50 hours for the first week, and 54 hours for the second, and boys over 16 would work 50 hours for the first week and 59 hours for the second week. But their actual work, taking away the time of going to work, was for boys under 16 40 hours, and over that age the same for the first week, and, for the second week, for boys under 16, 42 hours, and over 16, 47 hours. The average was 41 for boys under 16 and 43½ for boys over 16.

MR. PICKARD: Will the hon. Member state the actual hours worked per day?

SIR JAMES JOICEY: The actual hours worked per day were 10, except on Saturday. They were underground 10 hours. In Durham and Northumberland, where they had the oldest coal mine interests in the country, they had a system of working which was very advantageous so far as the miners were concerned. They had a system of double shifts, and he was prepared to state that the time that the miners worked was not more than 5½ to 6 hours. Therefore, if they compared the conditions of work in Durham and Northumberland with those of any other part of the country, they would find that these counties stood in the most favourable condition. He could bring someone to bear that out who was not generally in favour of the action they were taking. Mr. Keir Hardie, speaking in his (Sir James's) constituency, and alluding to the miners of Northumberland and Durham, said:—

> "They had done a great deal in the past towards setting an example to their fellow-miners throughout the country. He did not know any other place where the hours of labour were so short as they were in these two counties, and he did not know any organisations so strong as theirs. Whilst he had serious differences with the leaders of these men, he paid them, as they knew, every credit for what they had done in the splendid work of building up such organisations."

That was a very fair and unbiassed statement of the conditions of labour so far as the miners were concerned in Northumberland and Durham, and they had been brought about by the double-shift system. Measures were being taken to introduce machinery to draw coals instead of them being drawn by the boys. Many of the mines in the county of Durham were laid out on the old system, and if they attempted by Act of Parliament to make a hard-and-fast change like this they would do mischief and injury, not only to the mine owners, but to all those interested in the work. As to the boys, they were paid what they earned, and they earned from 15s. to 20s. per week, and they were very strong and healthy. They would find, whether they looked at the wages, the hours or conditions of labour, that the boys employed in the mines were not worse, but better off in many cases than were the boys engaged in many other industries. He saw great difficulty in applying a Measure of this kind to mines. If they took the ordinary engineering works or manufactory, the conditions were pretty much the same among them all. But who ever saw two mines exactly alike? ["Hear, hear!"] They found the most extraordinary differences existing in mines, and the mining industry was the last industry which should have a hard and fast line, such as that proposed by the Bill, applied to it. He had listened to the whole of the Debates which had taken place in that House on this subject, and he was bound to say no solid or sound argument had been adduced which ought, in his judgment, to induce the House to take action of the kind suggested in the Bill. If they wanted to apply legislation of this kind, they should apply it to industries where it would do the least harm.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said the hon. Baronet who had just sat down was not in quite the same position as the hon. Member for Merthyr. The hon. Member for Merthyr, although he moved the rejection of the Bill, was really among their friends, because he was in favour of the limitation of the hours of grown-up men. But the hon. Baronet was in a wholly different position, because although he put it rather mildly to-day, still he did put it that he was one of those who were opposed to a legislative restriction upon the hours of grown-up men. The hon. Baronet had suggested that the proposal embodied in this Bill might have been more fittingly applied to other trades than the mining industry. The reason for picking out this trade for this legislation was that, at the present moment, there was a much more general concurrence among the miners with regard to an eight hours' day, whether obtained by law or by agreement, than there was in any other trade. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" and "No!"] At all events, the overwhelming majority of the miners were in favour of this Bill. Merthyr and Aberdare, and Northumberland and part of Durham objected to the Bill. The men in the north had obtained shorter hours by trade union effort, and, therefore, they might be counted on the side of those who were for shorter hours in the mining industry. They had this fact, that while an eight hours' system for all the trades of the country, or for the great majority, was asked for by a large number of gentlemen in this country, and was supported sometimes by a majority, and sometimes by a large minority at the Trades Union Congress, there was almost absolute unanimity at those congresses in regard to this particular industry. The workmen of this country had themselves selected this industry as the one in which there was that general concurrence which enabled them to ask, with overwhelming power, that it should be treated with consideration on this question. Another argument which had been advanced was as to the character of the mining industry. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton said that mining was not unhealthy, and the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street distinctly described it as a healthy occupation. There was one thing to be said, whatever view they might take with regard to the healthiness or unhealthiness of mining—and he had never been disposed to exaggerate its unhealthiness—in considering the statistics on the point, and that was that men did not die, as a rule, as coal miners. It was an occupation of healthy men, and it was an occupation out of which the men, when they became weak and old, were driven. There were more driven out of it in some parts of the country than in others. Therefore, when they came to die, they did not always die as coal miners, but as something else. Then, in some parts of the country, Friendly Societies had found themselves forced to raise the contributions as against miners, and that went to show what they thought either of the unhealthiness or the risks of the occupation. But the House would remember that his hon. Friend who moved the Bill read the speeches of the Home Secretary and of the Colonial Secretary on this point the other day, when both went out of their way to describe coal-mining as the most dangerous occupation in this country. The hon. Baronet had said that the Return showing that the largest number of accidents occurred during the first four hours of the day had come upon him as a surprise. Surely, to one so experienced in coal mining as the hon. Baronet who had just sat down, it must be known that the risks on first going to work were greater then than at a later period, and he could not imagine that this had any bearing on the question. The hon. Member for Merthyr tried to show once again that there was either a preponderance of feeling on the part of miners against this Bill or a very large minority against it. Whether they looked at the number of delegates sent to the Trade Union Congress, or the representatives sent to that House, the overwhelming majority of the miners of South Wales were in favour of the Bill. On all the facts which had been presented to the House, he contended that they were justified in saying, therefore, that the great majority of the men employed in mines in South Wales were in favour of the Bill, and that none of them appeared to take the view which was held by the Northumberland and Durham miners against legislative interference with the hours of grown-up men. In dealing with the position of the question in Northumberland and Durham, he further showed that, notwithstanding the circular of the leaders opposing the shortening of the hours which had been issued and referred to that day, opinion in Durham had greatly changed among the men, and they had not been deterred in consequence of the adverse representations made against the eight hours' day from joining the Miners' Federation. [Mr. J. WILSON (Durham): "They have decided against the eight hours since!"] While admitting that the majority of the men in Northumberland were against the Bill, yet even there a considerable minority supported it. The objection of the Northumberland and Durham districts was directed solely to the question of lads. It had been shown by the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street on a former occasion that the boys worked ten hours; when they attained the age of 19 or thereabouts they became hewers and worked 6½ hours. It had been shown by the hon. Gentleman that day that the men worked from 5 to 5½ hours; but the hours they had won for themselves by means of their organisation were the shortest hours worked for wages, and they were, besides, short hours accompanied by higher wages. The shortening of the hours of the boys had not been attained by trade union action; the scheme in this direction had failed. The hours worked by the boys were those imposed by law against the wish of the colliery proprietors; but the lads worked ten hours a day in foul air, coal dust, and excessively high temperature, because it would be inconvenient to change a system which admittedly was not satisfactory. It appeared to be thought that some palliation for the long hours of the boys was to be found in the high wages earned; but high wages meant tremendous pressure of work accompanied by an element of danger. The hon. Member for the Chester-le-Street Division had quoted the panegyric passed upon the National Miners' Association by Mr. Keir Hardie, who said that it was the strongest organisation in the world. Bearing in mind the discussions of that Union at Newcastle the other day, he believed that if they could only solve the question of the employment of boys in the northern counties the opposition to the Bill would practically disappear. Several of the delegates spoke at Newcastle in favour of an eight hours' day, and some spoke about the iniquity of lads having to work for ten hours a day. But the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division said that any scheme for reducing the hours of boys, while retaining the benefits which the Durham and Northumberland miners possessed, would be impracticable; that the effect of the change suggested would result in a reduction of the numbers of boys employed, and the families would prefer the retention of the status quo rather than see their members scattered about the country. The hon. Member for the Chester-le-Street Division had said on a former occasion that if the present system were changed the boys could not be got for the purpose of equalising the number of shifts of men and boys. He could not see that that was consistent with the view taken by the Labour Members. The hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division said that the proposed change would result in the reduction of the number of boys. On the other hand, the hon. Member for Chester-le-Street said that the change would involve an increase in the number of boys, and that sufficient boys could not be obtained. Here there was an absolute contradiction. An alternative which had been discussed in that House on a former occasion was three shifts of men and two shifts of boys. His hon. Friend had quoted that day the evidence given before the Labour Commission by the Northumberland and Durham men. They were asked whether it would be practicable to adopt this system, and the reply was that it would not be practicable to get a sufficient number of boys to work under that system. In answer to another question, they said that the hours of the boys were not at all satisfactory, but when they were again asked as to this plan they said, "The plan discussed is two shifts of boys of eight hours each with three shifts of hewers," and they added, "It would be very difficult to obtain a sufficient number of boys." Thus the hon. Member for the Wansbeck Division said that the change proposed would reduce the number of boys employed, while the witnesses called by his association before the Labour Commission averred that the change would be impracticable because sufficient boys to carry it into effect could not be obtained. He was glad that nothing had been said that day in favour of the local option system, which had apparently been abandoned by the opponents of the Measure. That the hon. Baronet the Member for Birkenhead should have refrained from moving the Motion which he had placed upon the Paper was some indication of the progress of ideas on this question. It showed that the objection to this legislation was no longer based on the alleged impolicy of interfering with the hours of labour of adult men. The ground was shifted, and the objection was based upon the supposed difficulty of carrying the suggested change into effect. But he could not help thinking that, if the Northumberland and Durham miners would face the matter and consent to take a little trouble, the difficulty would be overcome, believing that the necessary number of boys would be forthcoming.

Sir ELLIOTT LEES explained that he had only refrained from moving his Amendment as a matter of Parliamentary policy, believing that a larger number of votes would be recorded against the Bill on a simple Motion for its rejection.

*Sir C. DILKE said he quite understood the wisdom of the hon. Baronet's tactics, because the cause which he championed was a declining cause, and very few people cared to repeat the academic arguments of former days as to the undesirability of interfering with the hours of labour of grown-up men. The hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division had mentioned the argument as to the probability of strikes to obtain shorter hours in periods of depressed trade. That was the most powerful of all the arguments against the local option proposals, because local option would seem to refer it to the arbitrium of strikes all over the country, whether this change should be put into operation or not. There would certainly be a serious risk of strikes all over the country in times of difficulty. The real question at issue in this Bill was not a theoretical one, but the practical one of what was to be done with the Durham and Northumberland boys. He knew there was some difference of opinion among the supporters of the Bill, but what difference of opinion there was it was a mere trifle to the difference of opinion which had been revealed in the speeches made against the Bill on one or two practical points. The local option system, in his opinion, would be most unfair to the coal owners, who would be driven to change their system of working altogether. The Staffordshire and Lancashire owners told them that there would be great practical difficulty in carrying out the Bill, and the owners who were friendly to the Bill all said that they would have to rearrange their working, though they believed in the long run it would not affect the output. The supporters of the Bill had tried to discuss it as a practical Measure, and to abstain from asking for votes under false pretences. They did not want the votes of Gentlemen who voted in favour of the Second Reading in order to redeem some promise made to their constituents, or because they thought it might be the more popular course to take, and having done so, voted against the promoters of the Bill on some critical point in Committee. They had sooner see the Bill lost than carry the Second Reading by the votes of Gentlemen who did not mean to support it. He did not say that the Bill must be carried without the change of a word or a letter, but every Member who desired the Bill to pass knew perfectly well what were the general lines of Amendments concerned with the principle of the Bill and what were not. The main Amendment pointing to local option in districts was one to which in no case the promoters of the Bill could consent. [" Hear, hear ! "]

*Mr. J. WILSON (Durham) said he would be the last person to say that the miners' work was not dangerous, or that the labour of the boys was not hard, because he had done the work and understood it. He had worked amid the dangers that surrounded a miner's life; but this Bill was not promoted for the purpose of lessening those dangers. He remembered that on the last occasion, when a Debate took place in the House on a similar Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham chided the promoters of the Bill with the fact that humanity was entirely lost sight of, and that the whole matter in dispute was the rectification of commercial interests in different districts. A remark had been made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean which he ought not to let pass, although there was a larger amount of truth in it than there ought to be, as to what became of the old men in a mine. A man ought not to be discharged like a worn-out horse simply because he was no longer of use; but it would not be fair that the House should understand that these men were discharged wholesale. Although some were discharged on that account many found work of other kinds about the mine. It would be unjust to the employers of labour in the County of Durham if he allowed it to be understood that every old man was discharged. ["Hear, hear!"] He would like to dispel another impression from the mind of the right hon. Gentleman about explosions happening in the early part of the day. His experience of the County of Durham was that they happened in the night time. They occurred generally when a shift was well worn out. There was another mistake that wanted rectifying, and that was as to the shortening of the miners' hours in 1872. The men's hours were not shortened in consequence of the Bill of 1872. They were shortened in consequence of the strength of the Union. An endeavour was made on the part of the coal owners in the County of Durham to work 12 hours a day, but the Union was rising in its strength, and the men demanded to work only 10 hours a day. Reference had been made to the Royal Commission on Labour, but why did not the representatives of the federation come forward and give evidence before that Commission?

MR. PICKARD: We regarded that Commission as a mere farce.

*MR. J. WILSON (Durham) said that however constituted, they ought to have come forward and subjected themselves to cross-examination. Why did not the representatives of the Federation go before the Commission, even if it were partly bogus or entirely bogus? ["Hear, hear!"] The Secretary of the Commission was sitting opposite, and he had no doubt he would give them some enlightenment on this point. A good deal had been said about employers encroaching where the hours had been shortened, but there never had been a single attempt on the part of the employers to encroach on the men in Durham. Therefore he thought there was a delusion on that point. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the demand for the Bill, he denied the statement that there was a growing demand for it. If there was a growing demand for it, where were some of the Members who supported it at the last election? ["Hear, hear!"] There was no greater object lesson than that supplied by the Member for Walthamstow. Therefore, on that ground the demand fell to the ground. What was the standard and test of the men down in their demand? He had no right to speak for the non-unionist, but he had a right to speak for the majority of the men who sent him there to represent them. [Cheers.] According to the statement at the Edinburgh Congress, there were 154,000 men in the organisation in the Federation area, but the hon. Member who introduced the Bill had told them that there were 400,000 down in the mines who could speak for the 250,000 who were not in the organisation. Had their view been taken?

MR. PICKARD: It has been taken twice over.

*MR. J. WILSON (Durham) ridiculed the idea that the views of the 250,000 men had been ascertained by the organisation. As to the circular which they had seen, it had been got up in a surreptitious manner. The men of Durham in October last decided to join the organisation. He admitted that, but since that time there had been another decision in Durham. He held in his hands the decision that had been arrived at for Durham, and he would like the House to understand the position in which Durham stood. When it was decided to join the Federation it was found that Durham was in a very peculiar position. The Council, represented by 200 delegates from the branches, arrived at this decision in February last. He quoted the exact words:—

> "The Eight Hours' Question—That the county having decided to join the Miners' Federation, and we having been informed that we must agree to support a legislative Eight Hours' Bill as a condition of membership; and as we remember that the county has decided by ballot in 1892, and by resolution in 1895, not to support such a measure, we cannot agree to accept that condition until the county alter the previous resolution on the question, either by Council motion or ballot. Will Delegates come prepared to say what shall be done in this matter? (1) Shall we rescind the previous resolutions? (2) Shall we support an Eight Hours' Bill? (3) Shall a ballot be taken on the subject?—Executive Committee."

The County of Durham had decided through a representation which was purely democratic against the Bill since October—["hear, hear!"]—and here was what they decided:—

> "We adhere to the resolutions now standing in the Association's minute books, viz., that we don't go in for the Parliamentary Eight Hours' Day; and that there be no ballot taken on the question. That the minutes of this meeting be confirmed and signed."

If the House would allow him he would give some reasons for his attitude against this Bill. First, he thought it unwise to pass the Bill considering the diversities of the districts. It was impossible to regulate and make uniform the laws of nature. [Cheers.] The emergencies and exigencies of the mining industry demanded a compromise, and a rigid Eight Hours Bill would not suit the interests of the miners. ["Hear, hear!"] In the engineering trade the same machinery almost would be found in every shop in the country; but in mining, the North and the South were totally distinct, and the very terms used in the North were not known in the Midlands or in Wales. ["Hear, hear!"] His position had always been this—he was against legislating for men who had the freedom of combination possessed by the men in this country. [Cheers.] If the men's organisation in any district had fairly tried to shorten the hours of labour and had failed, then he would not oppose their coming to the House of Commons. But where had that happened? ["Hear, hear!"] Of course, the organisation must not go to the employers with threats, and, throwing a sword in the scale, say, "That is the balance which you must accept." They must go in a spirit of conciliation and compromise. [Cheers.] The hon. Member for Normanton had referred to one case of failure, but there the Resolution presented to the employers declared that there could be no compromise. It allowed nothing for the technicalities and emergencies of the mine—for the fact that some men worked harder than others. A rigid Eight Hours Bill would be unfair to labour itself. Was it right that a man who worked down the pit in the most cramped position should have to work as long as the man who had easier work in better air? The men with the hardest work should have the shortest hours. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Normanton was at one time a strong opponent of the Bill. He and the hon. Member met in conference, and both argued against the Bill, and when he, with his perseverance, and the hon. Member, with his obstinacy, joined together, they were two stiff obstacles. [Laughter.] But the hon. Member had since been converted by the hon. Member for Walthamstow. The hon. Member for Normanton had a colleague at the Edinburgh Conference, Mr. Edward Cowey, who said:—

> "If they went to the State, the men would not do anything for themselves. They had already passed a resolution in favour of gaining the end by organisation, and now they talked about going to Parliament. Why, they would weaken their own position. They could not get the men to work for themselves as long as they thought they could get what they wanted by law."

But, perhaps, Mr. Cowey was also a convert, and he would quote still stronger testimony—that of the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean, in his book called "The Problems of Greater Britain." In describing the various municipal laws, the right hon. Gentleman wrote:—

> "The Eight Hours' Bill is so universal in Australia that these clauses are not really needed, as the workmen had enforced the complete carrying out of the principle before the custom of asserting them arose. The effect of the eight hours' day has been as satisfactory throughout Australia as in Victoria. As far as Australian example can bear on the English labour problem, it appears to be favourable to the attempt gradually to introduce the eight hours' day in the contracts of the State and of the municipalities."

That was in favour of trade union effort, and directly aganst Parliamentary interference.

*SIR C. DILKE: I hold the same opinion now as I held when I wrote those words.

*MR. J. WILSON (Durham) said he simply quoted the words. Of course, the writer might have meant to say something else. [Laughter.] To come to Parliament in this matter, with such rights of combination as the workmen enjoyed, was to sap their spirit of manly independence. In times when trade unions were illegal he could understand appeals to Parliament for everything; but such appeals now-a-days only sapped the men's desire for and allegiance to the trade organisations. He would appeal to the hon. Members opposite. Miners' hours were not the only hours which were too long. There were the tramway workers and the shop employés and others, whose hours were in the hands of the hon. Members. Let them begin by dealing with those. There was no man so much a hypocrite as he who wished to put his neighbour's affairs straight while his own were shamefully neglected. [Cheers and laughter.]

MR. PICKARD said that so many references to himself had been made that he felt bound to intervene. As to the circular which had been issued, he had simply reprinted what appeared in the Newcastle papers; and he had never written to any secretary in Durham, local or general, for any circular. In connection with that circular, a gentleman named Charlton had been reviled that day as a person incapable of speaking the truth. But Mr. Charlton had repeated in a letter to the newspapers the statements in the circular, and had added that there were 15 persons in and about the House who were self-elected, and had no right whatever to oppose the Bill on anyone's behalf but their own. As far as he could make out, there were no fixed hours in the coal mines of Durham and Northumberland. The Durham miners worked, as stated, seven hours a day, but the fact was the ordinary hands in the mines worked as much as ten hours. It was said that they could not bring the Bill, if it were passed, into operation in Durham. That statement would not hold good. Most of the coals were raised in that county by working three shifts, and of every 1,000 tons of coal brought to the pit's mouth, about 900 tons were produced on the three and four shift system. If such a large percentage of coal was worked in Durham in that way, it was mere subterfuge to say that it would be impossible for other managers to carry out the system they now suggested. Seeing that Durham stood in this unique position—namely, that they dare not re-take a ballot on the hours question, it was rather too late in the day to say that a council meeting or an executive committee meeting should shut the mouth of the democracy of Durham, and prevent them stating to the House and to the country what their real position was. Upwards of 29,000 miners out of 58,000 in Durham had voted for joining the Miners' Federation of Great Britain on the condition that the Federation supported the Eight Hours' Bill. He claimed the neutrals with the majority in that voting. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laughed, but the neutrals were always claimed by the majority in Trade Union matters. [Laughter.] For the first time during the last 50 years a geological and geographical argument had been raised with reference to the strata of the mines. That was a matter which the colliery owner was sure to take into consideration when he leased a mine, and as an argument against this Bill it was simply playing with the issue. ["Hear, hear!"] With reference to the question of Trade Union effort, he maintained that the Durham miners had made no headway since 1870, when the boys were working ten hours, just as they were now. Nobody knew better than the Member for Mid-Durham that if a serious attempt was made to get an eight hours day by Trade Union effort, almost every coalfield in the country would be idle. From 1871 to 1897 was a long stretch. Just imagine the Durham leaders striving and disputing with the coalowners during all that time for an eight hours day for boys, and without success. It was enough to make the heart sick. It was make believe to talk now about Trades Union effort, when they found the result at the end of 25 or 26 years was represented by a round O. His belief was that if they obtained an eight hours day by law, it would be much more simple, it would work more easily and with less friction, and it would be better for both coalowners and workmen. There could be no argument against compulsion, for they had compulsion already. Every man had now to remain in the mine a certain number of hours. In regard to the contention that there was no contracting-out in Durham, he said there was in this sense, that when the men suffered injury while riding the trams in the mine they could not sue for compensation under the Employers' Liability Act.

*MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham): If the hon. Gentleman will allow me I will explain.

Mr. PICKARD: I do not think I ought to allow you. [Laughter.] The fact he had mentioned had been brought to his knowledge years ago and could not be disputed. The Bill, if passed into law, would give to the workers of this country everything they had been hoping for for at least two generations. They wanted a shorter day, and they would continue to work for it by legal effort. Their friends in Durham, according to their own showing, enjoyed about three or four hours more leisure than did the men whom he represented, and it was an odd thing that they should try and prevent others from obtaining by law what they had themselves got by some other process. He thought the shorter hours of the Durham and Northumberland men were obtained by means of the double shift system and not by trade union effort. The Mining Association of Great Britain were the opponents of this Bill, and they had instructed hon. Members of that House to oppose the Bill in every possible way. He had been informed, however, that the chairman of that association believed in the principle of this Bill; if that were so he occupied an awkward position. Suppose that the hours of labour were limited by one hour a day, and that they had a thousand men killed every year at present, one-tenth of that number would not be killed, simply because they would not be in the mines, and would not, therefore, be exposed to the danger. The House had read a Bill similar to this one two or three times, and he appealed to the House to take this opportunity of settling the question. He contended that Liberal seats were lost at the last election in connection with the Liquor Traffic Bill, and not in connection with the Eight Hours' Bill. The Liberals at all events ought not to attribute the loss of seats to their attempt to ameliorate the condition of the workers. He cordially supported the Motion, and he trusted that the Bill would pass the Second Reading.

Mr. T. W. LEGH (Lancashire, Newton) said this Bill had been debated very fully on previous occasions, and it was practically impossible to say anything fresh on the subject. He ventured to think that they heard too much about the case of Durham and Northumberland, more especially in view of the obvious fact that the shorter hours of the men there were obtained by making the boys work longer. It was contended that an eight hours Bill practically was universally desired by the miners in England; that was a contention which for his part he was not in the least disposed to accept. The modest estimate of the promoters of this Bill was, he thought, that at least 90 per cent. of the miners were in its favour. He observed that amongst the promoters there appeared for the first time the name of an owner, the hon. Member for one of the divisions of Derbyshire; he was curious to know whether that hon. Member had introduced an eight hours bank to bank day in his own pit.

Mr. T. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): If you mean me, my name has been on the back of the Bill every year.

Mr. LEGH: Has the hon. Member introduced an eight hours' bank to bank day in his own colliery?

Mr. BAYLEY: I should be only too delighted to do so if all the other colliery owners would do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEGH asked why the hon. Member was so backward in regard to the matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYLEY said he might also ask why other owners were so backward in setting an example.

Mr. LEGH, continuing, said it was several years ago since a ballot on this question had been taken, and he could quite understand that many Members might not wish to appear in opposition to the policy of their union. Hon. Members opposite seemed to have curious views in regard to the value of the ballot, for a year or two ago, when a ballot was taken of the servants of the London and North Western Railway with regard to a particular question, they were told that that was a frivolous expression of opinion. He preferred himself to take a Parliamentary election as a test. The hon. Member for Walthamstow, who was a sort of apostle of the eight hours' movement in that part of Lancashire where he resided, when he stood for a constituency composed almost entirely of colliers was not returned.

MR. WOODS: I was returned by another place. [Opposition cheers.]

MR. LEGH said the hon. Member was not returned by a mining constituency, however, because the Eight Hours' Bill was extremely unpopular there. ["Hear, hear!"] If colliers were so unanimously in favour of the proposal, how was it they had not obtained what they wanted by private arrangement? It was idle to say that the Mining Federation were too weak to obtain what they asked for. There was no trade union more powerfully constituted, which had more able men at the head of it, or more loyally supported by well-disciplined and energetic men. If the coalminers were absolutely unanimous in their demand, how could a few hundred masters stand out against a general demand for an eight hours' day. The power of the Mining Federation had been shown over and over again. They could move their men in and out of the pits like an army of soldiers. The main argument in favour of the Bill was that it would promote greater safety. It was based on the fallacy that a coal pit was a place where the men went to idle away time and amuse themselves. The object of every man who descended the pits was to come out as quickly as possible, but to earn as much as possible while there. If Parliament diminished the period during which a man was below ground, the miner, in his desire to earn as much as he could in the time, would take fewer precautions to insure safety. The majority of accidents were not caused by explosions, but falls of roof, which would be multiplied if the men's time for securing their safety were diminished. If diminished hours brought increased safety why did not hon. Members opposite agitate for 48 hours work per week. It had been maintained by the Mover of the Bill that the output of coal would not be reduced if the hours of labour in mines were limited. But not long ago one of his friends, the hon. Member for Walthamstow, advocated this Bill on the very ground that it would reduce the annual output twenty million tons, and the hon. Member for Rhondda said he was prepared to support the Bill for that reason if for no other. In 1892 the subject of an eight hours' day for miners was made a test question. But in 1895 it did not figure at all in the election address of his opponent. He himself believed this was one of the agitations which depended entirely on whether trade was good. If it was good the men and their leaders thought they could indulge in experiments of this kind. The advocates of the Bill refused to see that there would be danger from foreign competition if the Bill were passed. When a deputation to Lord Rosebery pointed out the great impetus which would be given to Belgian trade if the Bill were passed, Lord Rosebery said that Belgium had just adopted universal franchise, and was it to be supposed, he asked, that the Belgians would go on working long hours when they had this? The hon. Member for Walthamstow, when asked whether there was not some danger of British trade being transferred to the Continent if this Bill passed, said, "Oh, no, there is not the least danger of anything of the kind. There is a Coal Porters' Union, and they will refuse to unload any coal that might arrive from foreign ports." So that these were to be the bulwarks of British trade —universal franchise in Belgium and the Coal Porters' Union in this country. It was admitted that many pits would have to be closed and men thrown out of employment if the Bill was passed. He was as much in sympathy with shortening hours of labour as anyone. The only difficulty was how it was to be done. He believed the Bill would inflict the most serious injury on a most important industry, and would prejudice the interests of those whom it was intended to benefit, and therefore he should oppose it.

MR. E. BAINBRIDGE (Lincoln, Gainsborough) said it was very important to understand how many the Bill would affect, and those who had not tried the experiment were not in a position to know. He had tried the experiment and wished to bring the result before the House, for he considered it would be a great advantage for Members to know how many miners were really affected. About 700,000 men and boys were employed. Of these about 200,000 belonged to districts that were opposed to the Bill. That left 500,000, and of those there were 250,000 who worked at the "coal face," and 250,000 who had the ordinary work of miners to perform. These stood in relation to the workmen of the country, who numbered 13 millions, at about 5 per cent. If the Bill could be shown to be no advantage to the men it was intended to help, and a disadvantage to the rest of the community, it ought to be condemned. In 1894 he tried the experiment at three different collieries to see whether the contention was correct or not that such a Bill would not affect the output. Those three experiments showed a reduction of 22 per cent. in one colliery, 32½ at another, and 23½ at a third. He asserted, without fear of contradiction, that, whether the result would generally be 20 per cent., or 10 per cent., the effect would be materially to increase the price of coal to every consumer in the country. An increase of 6d. per ton would mean an increase of £4,500,000 per annum. He thought the Bill would have the effect of absolutely damaging the men's interest, raising the price of coal to consumers, and bringing harm to the industries of the country, and he should therefore oppose it.

Mr. W. ABRAHAM (Rhondda Valley), in supporting the Bill, said South Wales was the most dangerous mining district in the kingdom, and there, according to the hon. Member for Merthyr, men were kept at work in the pits as long as 12 hours a day.

The House divided:—Ayes, 186; Noes, 227.—(Division List, No. 190—appended.)

QUARTER SESSIONS JURORS (IRELAND) BILL.

The Earl of DENBIGH in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that the object of the Bill was to relieve jurors summoned to try criminal cases from attending the Courts of Quarter Sessions in Ireland when there was no criminal business for them to transact. The Bill had been passed through the House of Commons unopposed and without Amendment. It had been introduced by Her Majesty's Government in response to many representations of the great inconvenience frequently caused to jurors. Obviously to many quarter sessions divisions of Ireland the Bill would be in no way applicable, because there was invariably criminal business to be done in the large towns. It was provided, therefore, that the Lord Lieutenant might specify the different divisions to which the Bill should apply. In those divisions notice of a Bill of Indictment to be presented must be given to the Clerk of the Peace at least three days before the Sessions, and in the absence of any such notice the Sheriff would notify the jurors that they were exempted from attendance. It was also provided that the Chairman of Quarter Sessions might adjourn the trial of any person in respect of whose indictment notice has not been lodged to the next Quarter Sessions or Assizes. Possibly one or two Amendments might be found desirable, but he anticipated no difficulty.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury) asked whether the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had been communicated with in connection with the Bill, which effected a serious change? The fact that the Bill was not discussed in the other House hardly recommended its acceptance unquestioningly.

The Earl of DENBIGH said that the Bill was promoted by the Irish Office. Last year the Bill was introduced as a private Measure, but certain objections were raised, and now the Bill had been taken up by the Government and its provisions had been modified to meet the objections. He believed that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland had had the Bill before him and had approved of it.

Read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

QUESTIONS.

CIVIL SERVICE CLERKS.

Mr. S. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether clerks of the abstractor class receive less annual increment of salary than temporary boy copyists serving under them; and whether, having regard to the long service of these clerks and their low maximum salary, he can see his way to increase their annual increment?

The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): A boy copyist is a temporary and unestablished employé, who under the present regulations cannot be appointed under 15 years of age or retained as such after 20. His ordinary pay is 14s. a week, rising by 1s. a week each year to a maximum of 18s. His increment is therefore £2 12s. a year. The old class of men abstractors, on the other hand, are permanent and established officers. As I have several times explained, they originally belonged to the class of men copyists which the Ridley Commission recommended should be abolished, but the Treasury in 1891 gave a number of them permanent employment on elementary clerical work as abstractors, with a title to pension and other advantages, allowing them to commence at their existing rates of pay (as a rule between £90 and £100 a year) and to rise by annual increments of £2 10s. to a maximum of £150. It is the fact, therefore, that the boy copyists' increment, while it lasts, is 2s. a year more than the abstractor's; but it only lasts four years at most, whereas the abstractors' last more than 20 years as a rule, and the hon. Member will see that there is really no comparison possible between the two classes. The abstractor class has only been in existence six years, and therefore none of the clerks can be said to have had a "long service" as abstractors. Any previous service must have been temporary and unestablished in the capacity of copyist, and it is obvious that as abstractors the men are in a far better position than they could ever have attained as copyists. Their maximum salary of £150 was fixed in consideration of the rudimentary character of their work, and the same consideration debars the Government from increasing the annual increment.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, whether the Lords Commissioners recently received a petition from the abstractor clerks in the Civil Service asking for an increase of pay commensurate with the duties devolving on them; whether an abstractor, who had served many years and had a salary over £100 per annum, had to submit to a large reduction on becoming a permanent second-class clerk; and, will the Treasury do anything to remove the grievance complained of?

Mr. HANBURY: Several such petitions have been received, but I am of opinion that the abstractors' pay is sufficient for the work they have to do. Abstractors are survivors of the old copyist class, and the Ridley Commission contemplated that they should be swept away. Instead of this they were formed into a new class with increased pay, pension rights, and other advantages. It was not intended that they should have prospects of promotion to the second division, for which they have passed no adequate examination. By Order in Council an entrant to the second division must commence at a salary of £70, and the Treasury has no power to override the order. If, therefore, such an appointment is offered to an abstractor he must choose between his actual pay (but without prospects of advancement) and the lower commencing salary, but greatly improved prospects of the second division. It would neither be reasonable nor conducive to the harmonious working of a department to pay him a salary 50 per cent. higher than that of the junior second division clerks, who would have entered the second division at the same time or even before him, and would be working side by side with him at the same work.

VACCINATION (ROYAL COMMISSION).

Mr. C. J. MONK (Gloucester): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the sixth volume of the Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination, containing the evidence taken so long ago as in 1891, is in the hands of the printers; and, if so, whether he is in a position to state when it will be delivered to Members?

The SECRETARY to the LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. Russell, Tyrone, S.): As I stated in reply to a question on Friday last, I am informed that the volume is now in the printers' hands and will be issued as soon as the lithographs accompanying it are ready. I can give no more definite information on the subject.

STRIKE AT NORWICH (INTIMIDATION).

Mr. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the charge to the grand jury by the Recorder of Norwich on 14th April, as reported by the Eastern Daily Press, in which, referring to a case of alleged intimidation in connection with a strike in the shoe trade in that city, the Recorder, after stating that he purposely refrained from reading anything about the strike, immediately went on to describe the conduct of the persons charged as abominable tyranny; and, whether, having regard to the fact that such language was calculated to prejudice the case in the minds of the grand jury, he will remit the remainder of the sentence of one month's hard labour?

The SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir Matthew White Ridley, Lancashire, Blackpool): The hon. Member has been good enough to send me the newspaper report to which he alludes, but there are no grounds, so far as I can see, for interfering with the sentence. The verdict of guilty on which the sentence was passed was, of course, as the hon. Member is aware, the verdict of the petty jury, and no complaint is made as to the manner in which the case was put before them by the Recorder.

ARMY SCHOOLMASTERS.

Mr. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in view of the facts that, on the promulgation of the warrant of 1st July, 1881, the rank of warrant officer was granted to all bandmasters then serving, but to those schoolmasters only who had served for 12 years before that date, although prior to the warrant in question all Army schoolmasters were senior in rank to bandmasters; that the rank of warrant officer is now granted to all bandmasters on appointment, but to schoolmasters only after eight years' service; and that schoolmasters under present conditions must often remain in the fourth class of warrant officers till the end of service, frequently for a period of 20 years; whether he will consider the propriety of extending to all Army schoolmasters the opportunity for promotion to higher grades which is now available for warrant officers of the Royal Artillery, Army Service Corps, and Army Ordnance Corps on satisfactorily completing a specified period in one rank?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): The position of Army schoolmasters has only recently been improved, and the Secretary of State is not prepared to reopen the question.

POSTMEN (NOTTINGHAM).

Mr. YOXALL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, why it is that the postmen of Nottingham, employed as they are in the eighth of the largest towns in the United Kingdom, are not placed on the first provincial scale of pay, and whether he will consider the propriety of placing the Nottingham postmen on that scale?

Mr. HANBURY: There are only three towns in England, Liverpool (including Birkenhead), Manchester and Birmingham, which are placed on the first provincial scale of pay. These towns have populations of 617,000 505,000, and 478,000, while Nottingham is under 214,000.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Mr. A. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to provide seats for the acting magistrates of the County of Middlesex to view the Queen's Jubilee Procession?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am afraid that I cannot comply with the hon. Member's request. It is not a matter in which I have any power or authority.

Mr. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the same privilege can be given to Members of this House to purchase five tickets for seats to view the Procession which has been granted to members of the Civil Service?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. A. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): Every available space will be brought into requisition, and I fear it is impossible to comply with the request of my hon. Friend unless the extra space be obtained at the expense of the officials of this House or of the members of the Press attached to the House, an expedient which I feel certain he would not desire. I have no knowledge of the fact mentioned by my hon. Friend. Stands are being erected by the Office of Works for various departments of the Civil Service; but I must disclaim all responsibility for the distribution of tickets, which has been left in every case to the discretion of the head of the Department concerned. If the facts are as described by my hon. Friend, either the head of the Department in question has not complied with my request to limit his demand for seats to moderate limits, or an unequal distribution of tickets must have been made in favour of one and at the expense of another class of officials in the Department.

ACHILL ISLAND.

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the resolution of the Westport Board of Guardians on the 29th ultimo, in which they state that the relief (outdoor) given to landholders in Achill is now so great that most of the relief given will be charged to the union at large, where the ratepayers are already overtaxed; will he take some measures to relieve the ratepayers of this burden; and is he aware that, according to the report of the relieving officer for Achill Island, only eight persons were employed on the relief works at Keel, Achill?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds Central): I have received a copy of the resolution referred to. There seems to be no reason to apprehend that the cost of the outdoor relief, if it is judiciously administered, will involve a heavier charge upon the rates than the ratepayers will be able to meet, and the necessity for Government assistance has not arisen. There are no relief works in operation at Keel, but a pier is under construction there, which affords employment to eight persons, and I understand that an additional number of persons from the locality will shortly be employed.

ACCOUNTS OFFICE (INDIA).

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the Circular, dated 11th January, 1897, and issued at the instance of Sir James Westland by the Comptroller General of India to his nine subordinates, with reference to the appointment of a number of higher classed clerks, at salaries of 60 rupees and upwards per month, to the Accounts Office; and whether these selections are to be made without the test of examination, and from among Europeans and Eurasians; and whether the reason assigned by the Finance Minister for such a step is to prevent the offices being filled with Bengalese exclusively?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have not seen the Circular itself, but I have read the reference to it in the Proceedings of the Legislative Council on March 13 and 27, and the Orders of Government therein mentioned. These Orders state that, the appointments being probationary, there is an opportunity to select for the higher posts either graduates or others qualified by their education, or candidates from other branches of the service. It is pointed out that promotion from the lower grades is in no way forbidden, but that "by confining the higher appointments too narrowly to persons who have entered the service in the lower grades, the very classes of natives among whom the best and most competent officers are likely to be found are excluded."

LONGFORD CANAL HARBOUR.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he has received a copy of a rider attached to the verdict of a coroner's jury in the case of an inquest on the remains of Michael M'Nally, who was found drowned in the canal harbour at Longford on the 23rd April, in which they state their belief that this man met his death principally owing to the unprotected state of the canal harbour there; and (2) whether, seeing that this is the sixth person drowned in this harbour inside five years, he will consider the Canal and Navigable Rivers (Ireland) Bill with a view to assisting the passage into law of some measure to compel canal companies to properly enclose, for the protection of the public, such harbours.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The finding of the coroner's jury has been communicated to the Midland Great Western Railway Company, who have promised to give the matter their consideration. Such a measure as that referred to in the second paragraph, if passed at all, should, in my judgment, apply to the whole of the United Kingdom.

RATES (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he has received copies of resolutions recently adopted by the Oldcastle and Bailieborough Boards of Guardians calling on the Government to extend to Ireland the same treatment in the matter of relief of rates as England got under the Land Rating Bill of last year; and (2) whether he can make any statement on the subject.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Copies of the resolution referred to in the first paragraph have been received. The question is one for the Treasury to deal with.

LAND COMMISSION.

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why only ten cases were listed for hearing on the last occasion on which the Land Commissioners sat at Larne, while many other cases in which application had been made in October last were not dealt with; and when a Commission will again sit at Larne?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The last list for the Larne Union contained all applications to fix fair rents for a first statutory term which were received in the office of the Land Commission on or before 24th October, 1896, and all similar applications for a second statutory term received prior to 9th October, 1896. At the time the Larne list was prepared, the Commissioners were unable to list cases from that Union beyond the dates above specified, having regard to the number of cases then being remitted to the Sub-Commissions from the different districts. The Commissioners will arrange a sitting at Larne on as early a date as possible consistent with the claims of other districts.

MR. DILLON: Is the right hon. Gentleman able to mention any date approximately?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir, I am afraid that I cannot do so.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in the case of tenants who obtain a reduction in their purchase annuities under Sub-Section (5) of Section 25 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, for how many years will it be necessary for them to pay the reduced annuity before their capital liability to the State is extinguished?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: For some years to come the tenants who will obtain reductions under Sub-Section (5) of Section 25 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, will be those only to whom advances were made under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, and previous Purchase Acts. The effect of the reduction in these cases at the end of each decade will be to extend the term for 49 years, provided the annuity remains 4 per cent. on the amount of the advance on each such occasion ascertained to be unpaid, and that the interest portion of the annuity continues as hitherto at $3\frac{1}{8}$ per cent.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

MR. J. McKILLOP (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that privileges and exemptions are enjoyed by Members of Parliament representing English and Welsh constituences that are not extended to Parliamentary Representatives in Scotland, and if he will, at a convenient opportunity, take means to have this grievance removed, and place all Parliamentary Members on an equal footing?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I understand that the Question of my hon. Friend refers to the fact that there is an Act (33 and 34 Vict. c. 77) exempting Members of Parliament representing English and Welsh constituencies from serving on Juries, and that there is no such Act applying to Scotland. I shall take the matter into consideration; and I shall be glad at a convenient opportunity to endeavour to redress the grievance of my hon. Friend.

WEST INDIA COMMISSIONERS.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state how soon the West India Commissioners are likely to issue their Report, and whether, in view of the precarious condition of the sugar industry by reason of the new bounties and the new American tariff, he will invite them to report within this month, or before the discussion on the Budget closes?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The West India Commissioners, who have just returned from visiting all the West Indian Colonies, have brought with them a mass of oral and documentary evidence, and are still awaiting further returns and documents from the Colonies and the United States. They are fully alive to the importance of Dispatch, but in view of the wide scope of the Inquiry, and the variety of important subjects which it embraces and the great amount of evidence to be dealt with, they cannot hope to submit their Report for at least eight or ten weeks from the present time.

CANADIAN TARIFF.

MR. JAMES ROCHE (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in consequence of the recent action of the Canadian Government in proposing to remove the duties hitherto imposed in Canada on English imported merchandise, Her Majesty's Government, in considering the advisability of denouncing the treaties of commerce at present existing between this country, France, and Belgium respectively, as being under these circumstances inconsistent with the Favoured Nations Clause of such treaties?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The matter is receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government, but I am unable at present to make any statement with regard to it.

PENNY POSTAGE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in face of the contention put forward by the postal authorities that the British Colonies, or some of them, object to the institution of Imperial penny postage from this country to the rest of the Empire, and in view of the offer of the hon. Member for Canterbury to furnish an absolute and incontestable refutation of that contention, he will appoint a small independent Committee to investigate and finally determine this question and report thereupon, and so put it beyond all doubt, and further to ascertain and report upon any further objection, if any, which can be raised to the establishment of Imperial penny postage or ocean penny postage to all parts of the Empire?

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member is incorrect in saying that the British Colonies have been represented by the Post Office as objecting to the institution of Imperial penny postage from this country to the rest of the Empire. Their objection has been to a penny postage from the Colonies to this country, many of them having an internal rate much above a penny, and bearing the loss of revenue which would therefore follow. The objection to an Imperial penny post, even if it were limited to mails going only to the Colonies from England, would come, not from the Colonies, but from foreign States over whose railways these mails would pass at a rate much below the 2½d. paid for mails to those countries themselves. The objections to ocean penny postage from this country to the Colonies, but not from the Colonies to this country, which is the latest modification of the hon. Member's proposals, can be better stated in a discussion on the Vote than in the narrow limits of a reply to a Question on the Paper.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON said that he desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman what objection he had to an Inquiry by an independent Committee as to the objections raised by the Colonies to the establishment of an Imperial penny postage. Would the right hon. Gentleman consent to an independent Inquiry on the subject?

MR. HANBURY: No. I have already said that the Colonies do not object to a penny post from this country.

MR. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.), asked whether it was the fact that the Australian Colonies objected to an Imperial penny post on the ground of the large number of letters they would have to distribute in Australia?

MR. HANBURY : No. I understand that the principal objection that comes from the Colonies has been to a penny post from the Colonies to this country. I am not aware of any objection raised by the Colonies to a penny post from this country to the Colonies.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON : May I be allowed to say in a few words that the Colonies offer no objection——[Cries of "Order."]

RIVER SUCK DRAINAGE.

MR. D. KILBRIDE (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the amount of the advances made by the Commissioners of Public Works (Ireland) to the River Suck Drainage Board prior to the passing of The River Suck Drainage Act, 1886, and the amount of the advances made between that date and the passing of the River Suck Drainage Act, 1889?

MR. HANBURY: The answer is £45,000 in each case; total, £90,000.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury (1) what is the total amount of the loans made by the Commissioners of Public Works, Ireland, to the River Suck Drainage Board; (2) on what terms as to repayment was the money advanced; (3) what sum was given by way of free grant to the Board; (4) what was the total value of the lands situated within the improvement area prior to the commencement of drainage works; (5) what is the addition to said total value resulting from the execution of the drainage works; (6) what are the amounts payable annually by the occupiers and proprietors respectively; (7) and on what basis has the apportionment as between occupiers and proprietors been made?

MR. HANBURY: The total amount advanced has been £122,802 9s. 8d., of which sum there is chargeable on the County Cess £1,815 for bridges (already repaid) and £13,000 under the Act of 1889. The terms of repayment are by annuity of £4 10s. per cent. (covering principal and interest) for forty years, as laid down by the Acts of 1889 and 1890. The amount of the free grant is £50,000. The original value of the 16,500 acres improved, as put forward by the promoters of the drainage scheme in 1877 and revised by the Inspector who held the Inquiry under the Drainage Acts, was £6,176 14s. per annum. The additional value resulting from the works is £3,013 12s. 2d. per annum. The annual charge is £3,013 12s. 2d. on the occupiers, and £3,189 15s. 8d. on the proprietors. The hon. Member will see that the charge on the occupiers represents the actual improvement to the lands. The charge on the proprietors represents the sum which will repay in forty years the balance of the advances, i.e., the unremunerative expenditure, including interest during construction, but excluding of course the amounts chargeable on the County Cess.

MR. KILBRIDE asked whether the £3,189 now charged to the owner meant that the occupier got no corresponding advantage whatever for it?

MR. HANBURY: No, I think it is purely unremunerative.

MANURES (GALWAY AND MAYO).

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to the fact that the lands of the small holders in the counties of Galway and Mayo are being seriously deteriorated by the continued use of artificial manures; and (2) whether he will use his influence with the railway companies, whose train service touches the seaboard of those counties, to reduce the rates charged for the carriage of sea-sand and sea-weed, so that these permanently beneficial manures may be made more generally available.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: My attention has not been specially directed to the fact mentioned in the first paragraph. If, however, any representations are addressed to me on the subject I will be prepared to communicate them to the railway company concerned, though I have no means of exercising any influence in the direction suggested.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, why letters arriving at Pettigo at 7 p.m. by the mail car from Bundoran and Ballyshannon are not delivered till 7 a.m. the day following, a reply by the return mail car which leaves Pettigo at 6 a.m. being thus rendered impossible by the detention for twelve hours of the letters in the post office at Pettigo; and, whether steps will be taken to remove this inconvenience and hindrance to business?

Mr. HANBURY: Inquiry is being made on this subject, and the Postmaster General will communicate the result to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, in view of the railway service which now exists between Ballina and Killala, in the county Mayo, he could arrange that the mails for Killala and the surrounding districts should be carried by rail to and from Killala, instead of by one-horse car to and from Ballina as at present; and whether he could make arrangements that the limited mail day train service should be extended to Killala?

Mr. HANBURY: Although there is now a railway between Ballina and Killala, there are no trains running morning and evening which could be substituted with advantage for the mail car, and the establishment of trains at hours specially suited for the mail—that is, the night mail—would not be warranted. The existing night mail service is already carried on at a considerable loss to the revenue; and as regards the extension of the limited day mail service to Killala, it is regretted the answer must be in the negative. There are no trains between Ballina and Killala in connection with the limited day mail, even if a margin of revenue were available for the extension of that mail.

EXPERIMENTS ON LIVING ANIMALS.

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether the London Hospital Medical School was registered under 39 and 40 Vic. cap. 77, in the years 1895 and 1896 for the performance of experiments on living animals; (2) whether the Government Inspector in his Report, dated the 5th of July, 1896, stated "that the names of all those 'licensed places' to which licenses were accredited are given in the tables"; and, (3) whether, having regard to the fact that the London Hospital has been omitted from the tables of the Government Inspector's Report for the year 1895, the Home Secretary will order an amended Report of the Experiments on Living Animals to be issued which shall be accurate?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The answer to the two first paragraphs is in the affirmative. There has been no inaccuracy, however, in the return. The hon. Member will find the London Hospital mentioned in the foot notes to Table 1, on pages 13 and 15. I must certainly decline to issue an amended table; but to meet what I imagine are the hon. Member's wishes, I have directed that in future returns all registered premises shall appear in the body of the table, whether any experiments are performed in them or not.

WATTISFIELD TOWN ESTATE CHARITY, SUFFOLK.

Mr. D. F. GODDARD (Ipswich): I beg to ask the hon. Member for the Thirsk Division of Yorkshire, as a Charity Commissioner, with regard to the new scheme which has been issued for the Wattisfield Town Estate Charity, Suffolk, dividing the charity originally left for the use and benefit of the inhabitants into one-third ecclesiastical and two-thirds general, although for the last 25 years less than one-sixth of the income has been used for ecclesiastical purposes, whether he is aware that the rector of the parish, besides being, with the churchwardens, sole trustee of the ecclesiastical part, has been constituted perpetua x-officio trustee of the non-ecclesiastical part; that the parish council has strongly protested against the scheme; and that this protest has been endorsed by the parish meeting and a memorial signed by 80 out of 100 householders in the parish; and, if these facts are correct, do the Commissioners intend to modify the scheme to meet the views of the inhabitants of the parish?

Mr. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R. Thirsk): No scheme has been made under the Charitable Trusts' Acts. The endowment being held in part for ecclesiastical purposes, an Order for its apportionment and management was made under the Local Government Act, 1894, Section 75; the Order was settled with special reference to the fact that payments have from time to time been made by the Trustees for a great number of years for exceptional expenses in connection with the Church; the other facts stated in the Question are substantially correct, though a memorial in support of the Order was received from 28 persons describing themselves as the principal landowners in the parish; the Commissioners made the Order after giving very careful consideration to all the circumstances and after a local inquiry by an Assistant Commissioner and cannot modify it; the Order is, however, subject to appeal to the High Court, under the conditions presented by Section 70 (2) Local Government Act.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say for what purpose police constables are required to attend the arrival of passenger trains at the various railway stations throughout Ireland; whether he is aware that in the case of country stations compliance with this rule frequently entails a journey of many miles a day; and whether he will suggest to the Irish Constabulary authorities the desirability of discontinuing the practice?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The police attend the arrival and departure of trains in the ordinary discharge of their duty, though it is only when they are quartered within half a mile of the railway station that they are required, as of course, to be in attendance on all trains. This duty has been performed by the police for very many years, and I see no reason for discontinuing it now.

MR. DILLON: Why is it necessary to have two constables at every railway station in Ireland, while it is not necessary in this country?

MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) asked whether it was not the fact that in this country the railway companies paid for what police service they required in their stations?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Yes, but I may remind the hon. Member that the police are paid for in Ireland by the Government.

PARISH COUNCILS.

*MR. J. W. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, if he is aware that in several instances the retiring chairman of a parish council has enabled the minority of a newly elected council to appoint the chairman for the ensuing year by giving two votes, although not himself a member of the new council; and, whether this defect can be remedied by an order of the Local Government Board; and, if so, will he advise the Board to adopt that course; and, if not, will he induce the Government to give facilities for the passing of a short Act to amend this flaw in the Local Government Act of 1894.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Local Government Board has been advised that the effect of the provisions in the Local Government Act, 1894, is that the outgoing chairman remains in office until his successor is elected and that whilst in office he retains all his powers and therefore is enabled to give a vote and a casting vote on the question of the election of his successor, and that this is so although he himself may not be at the time a member of the council. The hon. Member has drawn attention to a case where the result has been as stated in the Question, but I have no information as to the extent to which similar instances have occurred. The Local Government Board are not empowered to make any order in the matter, and I cannot hold out any expectation that the Government will introduce legislation on the subject.

*MR. LOGAN said the matter was one of great importance, and he asked the Government whether they would give facilities to pass a short Bill to do away with this gross injustice.

*MR. SPEAKER ruled that the Question had already been answered.

TELEGRAPH WIRES (CITY OF LONDON).

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that some want of agreement between the Post Office and the Commissioners of Sewers in London is causing great inconvenience and expense to private persons and firms, who are unable to get telegraph wires introduced or transferred to their premises by reason of the refusal of the Commissioners to allow the ground to be opened; and whether, in addition to the postal and telegraphic reforms promised in the Budget, the Postmaster General will take steps to overcome the results arising from the disagreement referred to?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware that inconvenience is being caused to private persons and firms by the refusal of the Commissioners of Sewers to give consent to open the ground for the provision or transference of wires to their premises. Powers have been conferred by Parliament on the Postmaster General to carry out works of this kind subject to the consent of the authorities controlling the streets, and he has a right of appeal to a legal tribunal, and in the final result to the Railway Commissioners against the refusal of consent. The Postmaster General is now considering what steps he should take in the public interest; but he trusts he will not be compelled to resort to appeal. The Commissioners of Sewers have in the past done what they could to facilitate the operations of the Post Office, and have shown the Department every courtesy.

Mr. ALBAN GIBBS (City of London) asked whether the Treasury would grant the Inquiry into the matters in dispute that the Commissioners of Sewers had asked for?

Mr. HANBURY said that he did not think an Inquiry was necessary. It really was a legal question. It was clear that the Post Office had a right of appeal, and, if the consent of the Commissioners was refused, they could carry on the appeal.

Mr. ALBAN GIBBS asked whether it was not a fact that the disagreement arose from the Post Office having obtained permission to break the streets for their own purposes, and having used it for the purpose of the National Telephone Company, and having refused to undertake that they would not again do so?

Mr. HANBURY said he had made special inquiries about this. The position was this. By an agreement made when the trunk wires were taken over from the National Telephone Company by the Government, it was stipulated under that agreement that the Post Office should lay the main wires between the exchanges of the National Telephone Company at their own cost. That agreement was sanctioned by Parliament. If any wires in connection with the Company were so laid by the Post Office, the arrangement was strictly limited to those main wires.

Mr. LOUGH said that the difficulty of the Commission of Sewers was not absolutely confined to telephone wires, and that his question was confined to telegraph wires.

Mr. HANBURY: But the difficulty is that, if two sets of wires have to be laid, it is an advantage to the local authorities that they should be laid at the same time.

JURORS (CO. TYRONE).

Mr. G. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that to hold Crown Sessions in Strabane will very largely increase the number of attendances of jurors required at Quarter Sessions from the divisions of Omagh, Strabane, and Clogher, County Tyrone; that the consolidation of these divisions for Crown Sessions was effected in 1876, in pursuance of instructions from the Government, with the object of reducing the number of jurors required, their attendance having been shortly before rendered compulsory under a penalty and in alphabetical rotation; whether two memorials similar to that now before the Lord Lieutenant have been considered by the Privy Council and rejected; and whether any further steps will be taken without consulting the jurors whom the proposed change would affect.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: With reference to this Question, I have to observe that the memorial recently addressed to the Lord Lieutenant in favour of the re-establishment of Crown Sessions at Strabane, has been considered by the Privy Council, who have declined to comply with the application.

BRIGADE OF GUARDS (ROUTE MARCHING).

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it be a fact that after six days' route marching undertaken by battalions in the Brigade of Guards, 220 men of the Grenadiers were reported sick and 12 men of the 2nd Coldstream Guards; what was the total marching out strength of the battalions referred to; and how many of the men in each were respectively long service men, short service men, or men enlisted for three years?

MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; the facts are not as stated. The 220 men of the Grenadiers were the total number who, during the six days in question, were for any cause seen by the medical officer. No record of such men was kept by the Coldstream Guards. The number who fell out was 22 in the Grenadiers and six in the Coldstreams, and the admissions to hospital were severally 17 and six. The marching-out strength was 1,460 Grenadiers and 980 Coldstreams. The three-years' men numbered 576, the seven-years' men 789, and there were 145 men of more than seven years' service, but these only refer to the 1st and 2nd Battalions of the Grenadier Guards and to the 2nd Battalion of the Coldstream Guards. The similar returns for the 3rd Grenadiers and 1st Coldstreams have not been received.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER asked whether the statement was not a serious libel on the Brigade of Guards.

CUSTOMS (PREVENTIVE OFFICERS AND BOATMEN).

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a petition referring to the conditions of employment of preventive officers and boatmen was received by the Board of Customs on or about 12th January last from the Customs' Waterguard Federation; and whether, if so, the subject-matter of the petition is under the consideration of the Board of Customs and the Treasury; and when an answer or decision may be expected in regard to the matter?

MR. HANBURY: The matter is under the consideration of the Board of Customs, who will shortly issue their decision in a circular Minute.

AGRICULTURAL RATING ACT, 1896.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he can now state approximately the total area and valuation, and the average rate per pound, of the land relieved by the Agricultural Rating Act, 1896?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The rateable value of the "agricultural land" in England and Wales at the date of the passing of the Act referred to was, according to the Returns furnished by the Assessment Committees, £24,563,000. I am unable to state what is the acreage of this land, or the average rate in the pound of the several rates levied in respect of it.

MR. KNOX asked whether the hon. Gentleman could not state the sum which the Government were going to pay on this area; then hon. Members could work out the rate per pound for themselves?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: That was not asked for, and I cannot give it.

*MR. SPEAKER said that the Question on the Paper had been answered.

MR. KNOX, as a point of order, said he had asked the hon. Member what was the poundage rate, and the hon. Member—

*MR. SPEAKER said there was no point of order.

MR. KNOX said that the answer of the hon. Member was really an evasion of the Question which had been put to him. [Cries of "Order!"] He asked for two things—the valuation and the poundage rate. The hon. Member gave the valuation, and could have also given the amount paid by the Government. It was clear that if he knew the amount paid by the Government he could have given the poundage rate. ["Order, order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER repeated that the Question was out of order; the Question on the Paper had been fully answered.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, St. Patrick (MR. FIELD), I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any interest has been allowed on the money which is accruing to Ireland from the Agricultural Rating Act of last year; and whether he can state what rate will be given by the Government?

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that the money is accruing in the Exchequer. The Local Taxation (Ireland) Estate Duty Act of last Session requires the Inland Revenue Board to pay over to the Irish Local Taxation Account periodically sums equal to 9-80ths of the sums payable to the English Local Taxation Account under the Agricultural Land Rating Act. The first of such payments, amounting to £74,870 13s. 2d. was made at the end of last March, as required by the Act, so no claim upon the Exchequer for interest can possibly arise.

MR. J. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant a Return showing the extent to which the local ratepayers in Ireland would be relieved if the Agricultural Rates Act of last year were extended to Ireland?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not prepared to give this Return. It could not be compiled with any degree of accuracy without much labour and expense. I doubt whether it could be compiled at all in the absence of regulations similar to those prepared in connection with the English Rating Bill.

POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, what are the difficulties in the way which prevent the exchange of postal orders with Australia; whether the Australian Colonies at a Postal Conference, held at Hobart in March 1892, made a request to exchange postal orders; whether he is aware that the Postmasters General of the Australasian Colonies are unanimously of opinion that the risk of fraud would be no greater than now encountered in using postal orders in England; and whether he will consent to give the system a trial?

MR. HANBURY: The main objection to the establishment of an exchange of postal orders between this country and Australia is the danger of loss by forgery or fraud, which would be a serious risk in view of the length of time that must elapse before the discovery of the forgery or fraud. Although a resolution in favour of an exchange of postal orders with the United Kingdom was passed at the Postal Conference held at Hobart in 1892, no general proposal from the colonies has been received; and it is not known that the Australian Postmasters General are unanimously of opinion that the risk of fraud would be no greater than is now encountered in using postal orders in England. The Postmaster General has been giving careful consideration to the question, but no means of overcoming the objection to which I have referred has presented itself, and he regrets, therefore, that he is not prepared to give the system a trial.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the following inequalities in postal order commissions and charges; to forward 8s. the cost is 2d.; to forward 15s. the cost is 1½d.; to forward 17s. the cost is 2½d.; to forward 12s. 6d. the cost is 2d.; whether he will reconsider the decision of the officials not to issue intermediary postal orders from 6d. up to 20s., or whether he will take evidence from the public on the question; and whether he will so far meet the wishes of the people by issuing postal orders for 7s., 8s. and 9s.?

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is, of course, aware of the scale of poundage upon postal orders. The inequalities are due to the fact that postal orders are issued for fixed sums, and that it requires two postal orders to transmit the intermediate sums. It was explained to the hon. Member on May 1 last year that the Government did not propose to incur the expense which would be involved in issuing postal orders rising by graduations of 6d. up to 20s., and they do not see their way to reconsider this decision. It does not appear that any useful object would be served by taking formal evidence from the public on this question, for the public are never slow to bring their wants to the notice of the Postmaster General. That the convenience of the public is met already appears to be clear from the fact that postal orders are very popular, and that their circulation reaches 67 millions a year. The Postmaster General does not propose to issue postal orders for 7s., 8s. and 9s.; any increase in the number of denominations would involve increased expenditure, which it would be necessary to meet by an increase in the rate of commission.

DEATH OF WORKHOUSE INMATE (CITY OF LONDON).

Mr. D. CRILLY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that at an inquest held yesterday at the Hackney Coroner's Court, on the body of an old woman named Margaret Ross, the evidence showed that the deceased had been an inmate of a City Union Workhouse; that her age was 77 years, and that she had been found dead on Thursday last beside the washing pail which she had been using in her work; also that the workhouse authorities had been in the habit of compelling this old woman to clean out a large ward containing 12 beds; and whether, if the evidence correctly states the facts, he will hold an inquiry as to the degree of responsibility which attaches to the officials of this workhouse for the death of Margaret Ross?

Mr. T. W. RUSSELL: The Local Government Board have applied to the Coroner for a copy of the depositions at the inquest, and are making further inquiries in the case. When these are complete, the President will then determine what action, if any, on the part of the Local Government Board is necessary.

AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. BERNARD MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the adverse opinion expressed, irrespective of Party, to the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill, he intends to proceed further with that Bill; and, if not, whether, before introducing another Bill on the same subject, he will consult with the representatives of Ireland on the nature and form of such Bill?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: It would, in my judgment, be altogether premature to assume that the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill has been condemned by public opinion in Ireland.

Mr. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he proposes to take the Second Readings of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill and of the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not in a position at present to fix a date for the Second Reading of the Agriculture and Industries Bill. As regards the Poor Relief Bill, I propose to put it down for Monday, and trust it may be reached in time for discussion on that day.

CAPE GARRISON.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many officers, non-commissioned officers, men and horses were required to complete the three field batteries recently placed under orders for the Cape; from what source these details were drawn; and whether any of the field batteries on the roster for foreign service were called upon to supply drafts?

Mr. BRODRICK: No officers were required to complete these batteries for foreign service, but 189 men and 272 horses were supplied from 20 other batteries, all of which except two were on the lower establishment.

SEAFORTH HIGHLANDERS (1st. BATT.).

Mr. F. B. MILDMAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can inform the House how many men it was necessary to transfer from the 2nd Battalion Seaforth Highlanders (home coming from India) to the 1st Battalion of the same regiment, now stationed in Crete, in order that the latter battalion might be made up to proper strength for foreign service?

Mr. BRODRICK: The relief of the Seaforth Highlanders was carried out in complete accordance with the system of linked battalions. The one linked battalion relieved the other. The battalion coming home left 500 men for further foreign service; these the battalion going abroad took over, leaving at home about 250 men, mostly below the age for foreign service, to complete the home-coming battalion on its arrival. When, therefore, the 1st Battalion was ordered to Crete it was not necessary to transfer any men to it. The battalion was already at full strength of men in the best condition as to age and service.

CRETE.

Mr. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any, and, if so, what progress has been or is now being made in the removal of Turkish troops from Crete, and in the settlement of the form of that autonomy which the Six Powers have promised to offer to the Cretan people?

Mr. CURZON: The difficulties in the way of the withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Crete, which I stated in my reply to the hon. Member for Northampton on the 27th inst., still hold good, and it has not, in consequence, been found possible to make any further progress in arranging for their removal. With regard to the settlement of the form of autonomy which is to be granted to the Cretans, I have nothing to add to the answer which I returned to the hon. Member for the South Molton Division on the 4th inst.—namely, that the Great Powers intend to carry the project into effect, but that the continued presence of the Greek troops and the consequent attitude of the Cretan Christians render progress in this respect very difficult.

Mr. BRYCE: Am I to understand from that answer that the form of the autonomy, the outlines that it will take, have not yet been settled?

Mr. CURZON: These matters have been under the consideration of the Powers, but I have given reasons why it has not been practicable hitherto to put a scheme of autonomy into practical operation in the island.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC COMMISSION.

Mr. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state what steps the Government intend to take to give effect to the recommendations of the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the administration of the various funds controlled by the Royal Patriotic Commission?

Mr. BRODRICK: The Supplemental Commission recommended by the Select Committee, covering its more important recommendations, was issued on April 3, and is being acted upon by the Royal Commissioners.

SIR ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (CAPTURE OF).

Admiral FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether he can state if there is any truth in the report in The Times of to-day that one of my influential constituents, the Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield, is now a prisoner on board a Greek man-of-war—[laughter]—having been taken out of a Turkish coasting vessel when on his way to Salonika; whether any representation has been or will be made to the Greek Government at Athens, and a demand presented for his immediate release, together with a suitable apology—[laughter]—for this breach of international courtesy; or whether the hon. Gentleman is to be deemed contraband of war. [Loud laughter.]

Mr. JAMES CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): Before the right hon. Gentleman replies, I wish to ask him whether it is the case that the son of the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division is detained by the Greek Government, and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will use their great influence with the Greek Government with a view to securing the son's immediate liberation on the ground that a son cannot be held responsible for the acts of his father? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURZON: I am sure the House appreciates the solicitude which the hon. and gallant Admiral has so promptly displayed on behalf of his influential constituent. It is true that the hon. Member for Ecclesall has been captured—[laughter]—on board a boat off the coast of Greece. I am happy to be able to assure the House that he is in no personal danger. I cannot say without further consideration whether his capture ought to be regarded as a breach of international courtesy, but I apprehend that under no circumstances could the hon. Member be regarded as contraband of war. [Laughter.] He has been taken to Athens, where he is to be placed at the disposal of Her Majesty's Legation. [Laughter.] In reply to the hon. Member opposite, I have to say that there is every reason to hope that the son will receive the same clemency as is about to be bestowed on the father. [Laughter.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I wish to ask whether the arrangement for taking the Foreign Office Vote to-morrow stands good; and what business will be taken on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I understand that the arrangement referred to by the right hon. Gentleman stands good. After the Foreign Office Vote, the intention was to take the Vote relating to the increase of the garrison in South Africa. On Monday it is intended to proceed with the Committee stage of the Necessitous School Boards Bill.

MR. J. MORLEY: I am afraid my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition will be away to-morrow, and it will be rather inconvenient if the South African Vote were taken in his absence. I should be glad to know whether that Vote could be postponed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That will be postponed, then.

MR. T. BURT (Morpeth) asked the Home Secretary when the Second Reading of the Workmen's Compensation Bill would be taken, and whether it was likely that it would be taken next week?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have not had an opportunity of speaking to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House since notice of the Question was given to me. All I can say is, that it will certainly not be taken on Monday, and I will take care that ample notice will be given.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS AND THE JUBILEE.

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, in asking leave to introduce a Bill to enable Metropolitan Police Courts to be closed on special Bank Holidays, said that at present the only way of closing these Courts was by declaring the day a day of public thanksgiving under the provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882, the result of doing so would be that bills of exchange falling due on that day would become payable on the day preceding. But the day being also a bank holiday bills would be payable, under another provision of the same Act, on the succeeding day. That would give rise to great inconvenience.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Sir Matthew White Ridley and Mr. Jesse Collings; presented accordingly, and read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 220.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS (BUDGET RESOLUTIONS).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

AGRICULTURAL RATING (IRELAND).

*MR. VESEY KNOX (Londonderry) proposed to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add instead thereof the words:—

> "In the opinion of this House, the Agricultural Rating Act of last year, not having been extended to Ireland, operates as a bounty to the English farmer as against the Irish farmer who is competing with him in the same markets, and that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government in the financial proposals of the year to remove this inequality, and to grant to the Irish farmer the same measure of relief from rates which has been given to the English farmer."

He said he should make no apology for submitting the Motion on going into Committee of Ways and Means, though it was true that there was no precedent for some years past for such a Motion. He believed he could claim the unanimous assent of every single Member of the House of Commons representing an Irish constituency who was not a Member of the Government. On that ground he claimed somewhat more attention from the Government than had been habitually given to the demands of Irish Members. This was not a sectional demand. It was a national demand. It was not a request for generosity, but a demand for justice. ["Hear, hear!"] Irishmen were not prone to unanimity—["hear, hear!"]—but that fact, he thought, emphasised their unanimity on this occasion. It would, no doubt, be suggested that they were only unanimous now because they were all interested in this question, and because they had a demand to make for money on the British Exchequer. In one sense every Member of the House was interested in a question of this kind, and the vast majority, he frankly admitted, were interested in opposing the Motion; but he was sure that most English Members would regard it as an insult if they were told they were going to oppose the Motion because they were interested in opposing it. As far as he was himself concerned, he represented an urban constituency, and his constituents were not directly interested in the matter, and a whip signed by eight Members had been sent out, four Unionist and four Nationalist Members, only three of whom represented agricultural constituencies. The other five were not in any sense, nor were their constituents, interested in the question. They had signed the whip because they thought that Ireland had been badly treated in this matter, and had a right, as a nation, to demand redress. He would ask English Members, therefore, seeing that this demand came before them with such unanimity, not to vote down the Irish Members hastily or without consideration. His demand was that the Irish farmers should be given the same measure of relief as had been given to the English farmers by the Agricultural Rating Act. The object of that Act was, in the first place, to relieve the English farmers of half their rates; and, in the second place, to make up to the local authorities the loss so incurred. He knew that some of his hon. Friends above the Gangway held that the Bill was badly designed as a Measure of relief to the farmers, but he spoke of it as the Government designed it and defended it, and he believed that the description he had given of the Act was, in their view, correct. He turned now to the Report of the Royal Commission on Agricultural Depression, on which the English Act was founded. In that Report, three grounds were given why the agricultural industry should be relieved: first, that there was an undue pressure of Imperial taxation on land; secondly, that there was a very heavy pressure of rates on the farmer, a heavier pressure than that on the householder; and, thirdly, that agriculture was in a depressed condition, due to low prices and foreign competition. He would ask whether any one of those three reasons was not as much applicable to Ireland as to Great Britain? ["Hear, hear!"] He ventured to say that every one of them applied to Ireland as much as to Great Britain. It was true the Commission did not so report, but they could not have so reported. They had not got a Report of a Royal Commission in their favour, but the Report of the Royal Commission for England applied with greater force to Ireland. As to the taxation of land, there was only one tax which did not apply to Ireland; all the other taxes were the same in the two countries. This taxation was now less than a million a year, and the valuation of land in England was over 170 millions, so that the land tax over England averaged less than 1½d. in the pound. As compared with the vast mass of Imperial taxation, this particular tax was very small. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that Irish farmers paid less income tax than English farmers, but Sir A. Milner had declared that since the reduction in Sir W. Harcourt's Budget, the income tax on farmers in England was not worth the cost of collection. There were, on the other hand, some taxes on land which pressed more heavily on Ireland than on England, and that was especially true as to the Death Duties. In Ireland it was the earth hunger of the tenant which was taxed. He had carefully worked this out, and he thought it would be admitted that Ireland paid a larger proportion than England. The last figures available as to the Death Duties showed that the increase under the Act of the hon. Member for Monmouthshire was in England 22 per cent., and in Ireland it was over 30 per cent. He was taking the total increase of the Death Duties.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): May I remark here, I noticed some time ago a statement by the hon. Member, and I think it is clear he is mistaken? As a matter of fact, the increases in the total Death Duties are practically the same in Great Britain and Ireland. I have had the figures taken out.

*MR. KNOX said the right hon. Gentleman was, then, perhaps right; but, at any rate, he would not be able to show that land in Ireland was taxed less than land in England. He did not agree that the land in either country was especially over-pressed by Imperial taxation; but that was a matter of opinion. All he did say was, that if there was undue pressure in one country, there must be the same undue pressure in the other. What he therefore had to find was the relative amount of the rates in the two countries. Now, in England, the agricultural rate was generally estimated at, on the average, 2s. 2d. [Hon. Members: "2s. 4d."] Well, taking the average at 2s. 4d., he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to find a single farmer in Ireland whose rates were not higher than the highest average in England. ["Hear, hear!"] The valuation in Ireland was higher than it was in England. The valuation in Ireland had not been revised for 40 years, which was almost an incredible thing in a civilised country. He believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer 20 years ago, when Chief Secretary, brought in a Bill on the subject, and if he introduced his Bill now the Irish Members would not oppose it. He found the rents all fixed 27 per cent. below the valuation. Of course, it might be said that they were not fixing the rents fairly. ["Hear, hear!"] He on his side said the rents fixed were too high, and the Government would say the rents fixed were fair. Even proceeding on the basis that the valuation was about the same in the two countries, he found that, after a careful calculation, the average rural rate was about 3s. 3d. in the pound on agricultural land in Ireland; and for England the rate was 2s. 2d. in the pound. The Irish rate, therefore, was 50 per cent. higher. If the Irish valuation was a great deal too high—10 to 20 per cent. too high at least, as he maintained—the Irish rate must proportionately be a heavier burden on the land than the English rate. ["Hear, hear!"] Furthermore, in considering how any burden pressed on the people, they had to consider whether it was spread equally over the whole country. It would be generally admitted that if the rates of England had been the same in all parts of the country the burden would not have been complained of as much as it was; it was because in some parts the rates were higher than 2s. 2d. that they were so much complained of. But the inequalities of the rates in Ireland were infinitely greater than anything of which there was any experience in England. In the Debate last year the President of the Local Government Board said it took his breath away to find that in Essex there were 15 farms, the rates of which were 6s. 8d. in the pound. That was a prize case which had been discovered by the right hon. Gentleman. [Cheers.] The Irish poor rate was not assessed by the union as the English rate was, but the greater part of it was assessed for the electoral division, which had an area much smaller than the English parish, and the rate varied so much that in some electoral divisions it fell to 2d., and in others it rose to 5s. 11d. in the pound. The county cess went up in many cases to 10s. in the pound. [Cheers.] He was prepared to hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer say that his official information did not tally with his information, but he found that in his evidence before the Royal Commission on Financial Relations Mr. Robinson, a Local Government Board Commissioner in Ireland, whose object, like that of all officials, was to minimise the sufferings under which the Irish laboured, said:—

> "In the poorer unions all round the western seaboard there is found considerable difficulty in levying rates, and, of course, the county cess is sometimes very oppressive. In the county of Kerry the county cess is extremely high. The average in the county of Kerry for the five years ended 1893 was in the barony of Clanmaurice 5s. 1d. in the pound and in Corkaguiny 6s. 4d."

That only related to county cess. When he quoted some of the Kerry figures last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said he had omitted the allowance for light railways, but he found that Mr. Robinson said, "The averages I have given do not include light railways." In addition to the county cess there was the poor rate, and that varied on the average of five years in various parts of Kerry from 3s. 3d. to 3s. 10d. It was much under the mark, therefore, to say that the rates paid over the whole of County Kerry had averaged for five or six years more than 10s. in the pound. Where, in the face of those facts, were the 15 farms in Essex? It was not only in Kerry that this state of things prevailed. Mr. Robinson showed that the limit of taxation had been reached in Connaught, and five union workhouses had actually been seized for debt. [A laugh.] The rates in the Belmullet union, where the workhouse was seized, were 13s. 5d. in the pound. Mr. Robinson said there was much more difficulty in collecting such rates from the landlords than from the tenants. [Cheers.] The reason of that was not that the landlords were dishonest, but because they were hard up. All classes, in fact, felt the pressure of local taxation. The Irish rates were not merely enormous, but they were increasing, and that was a matter in which Ireland's state compared in a most acute degree with England's. From the Report of the majority of the Royal Commission on Agricultural Depression it appeared that, according to Reports of Mr. Goschen and Sir Henry Fowler, the rural rates in England were lower than they were before the repeal of the Corn Laws, and that that was chiefly due to the great diminution in the cost of the relief of the poor. In Ireland the circumstances were quite different. The total local taxation there was a mere trifle at the beginning of the century, but it rose 50 per cent. between 1866 and 1884, and it was still rising. He would be asked what was the cause of this pressure of local taxation. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might point to speeches of Nationalists in which the increase was attributed to the unrepresentative character of local bodies, or to speeches of Unionists in which it was attributed to the wasteful expenditure of some Boards of Guardians. The causes of the increase were not to any considerable degree political at all—[" hear, hear! "]—but the increased expenditure was due almost entirely to essential economic conditions. Last year the First Lord of the Admiralty, in drawing a comparison between urban and rural rating, said that to a great extent the expenditure in the agricultural parts was a compulsory minimum expenditure, for which those who paid the rates were unable to see any single advantage to themselves. That was certainly true of Ireland. The greater part of the local taxation in Ireland really was a compulsory minimum expenditure which the people could not avoid, and for which they got little apparent benefit; it was expenditure on roads, the maintenance of pauper lunatics, and the relief of the poor. Could it be said there had been no agricultural depression in Ireland? The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say that the depression only affected wheat land, and, thanks to the repeal of the Corn Laws, Irish land was no longer suitable for wheat. But the President of the Local Government Board, speaking last year on the English Bill, said the suggestion that they ought to relieve arable land and not grass land was a most astounding one for Essex, which was the most depressed county in England, was over thousands of its acres nothing but grass land. Let the Government have it one way or the other. If grass land was not subject to depression, why did they relieve it in England? If it was subject to depression, why did they not also relieve it in Ireland? But it was not true to the extent some people supposed that Ireland was a country of pasture land. In the north-east corner of Ireland there was a larger proportion of tillage than in any other part of the United Kingdom, not excepting the Lothians. The people there were mostly Unionists, friends of the Government—their last friends in Ireland. Why had the Government carefully excepted them from the Measure of relief which they had extended to the other agricultural ratepayers of the United Kingdom? The same causes which had created agricultural depression in this country had applied to Ireland. Ireland had suffered from foreign competition in butter and bacon just as England had suffered from American and Russian competition in wheat. Ireland had suffered from the competition of bounty-fed flax growers in Belgium and France. It was a mere farce to say there was no agricultural depression in Ireland. They might be referred to the high price paid for tenant right. Nobody could regret more than he did the fact that Irish farmers were sometimes such fools as to pay absurd prices for the tenant right to patches of land. But that was not an economic price at all. The farms so bought were mostly small. Let anyone try to sell a farm of 40 or 50 acres in any county in Ulster, where tenant right was not a novelty. He would find that he would not be able to do so for a very long time. As a matter of fact, in Antrim and Down, tenant right brought considerably less than it did in the sixties, before it was protected by law at all. The fact was that the high prices paid for tenant right in Ireland were a proof, not of the value of the land, but of the poverty of the country in other industrial resources.

At any rate, it did not sound very well for a Government which last Session rejected the argument with regard to tenant right, when it was urged by Irish Unionist Members, to use it this year to defend their own pockets and their own Treasury. He suspected that the real reason why the Government treated Ireland so shabbily was that they found that to do justice and give Ireland the same measure of relief that was given to England would be very expensive. They were always willing to be generous when they could be generous on the cheap. The agricultural land of Ireland was estimated last year by the Chief Secretary to be just under nine millions sterling. A reduction of the rates by one half would amount to £733,000, and, of course, if the Government could put Ireland off with £150,000 for a board in Dublin it would be much cheaper for the Treasury. The argument could be used in favour of the system of the Government that it was cheap; but it was also nasty. What defence could there be for giving Ireland relief for her agricultural depression, not in proportion to the amount of her land, but in proportion to the amount of land in England. The excuse was that there was some solemn, sacred principle of 80, 11 and 9, which had an authority superior to most of the rules of arithmetic, and almost equal to that of the Binomial Theory—a thing which nobody could dispute, and which few could understand. It was invented not long ago by the ingenious mind of the First Lord of the Admiralty when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was making the Probate Duty grant in aid of rates. He found then, what the Treasury found now, that the rates in Ireland were very high, and that, if he made a grant to Ireland in proportion to the rates, he would have to give Ireland a very large sum; so he proposed to return the money to each of the three Kingdoms in proportion to the contribution of that Kingdom to Imperial taxation. Did anybody ever hear of a greater separatist? The right hon. Gentleman was the only man who had ever given effective legislative recognition to Irish nationality. He, however, noticed that the right hon. Gentleman only did this on those occasions on which he also gave a practical advantage to the British Treasury. He did not, for instance, as First Lord of the Admiralty, give Ireland nine-eightieths of the orders for shipbuilding which he gave to England.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): You should have them if you had the yards.

*MR. KNOX said they had a yard in Derry which was passed by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member as fit to do that work; but they refused to give it a single order, and the industry died. If the right hon. Gentleman made a firm offer to give Ireland 9 per cent. of the work they would have the yard there to-morrow. The Member for East Belfast could get along without the orders of the Government. He could build better ships than the Admiralty could obtain in the South of England if they tried till doomsday. The Government only applied the doctrine of 9-80ths where it suited the Treasury. They had a remarkable incident of that in the case of the grant for free Education. They decided to apply the principle of 9-80ths so long as it suited the Treasury, but changed it so soon as the balance went the other way. The First Lord of the Admiralty when, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, he gave Free Education to England said he would give Ireland not 10s. per child, but 9-80ths of what England got. That principle had since been described by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer as a ridiculous principle. They might settle it between them. The Treasury at first thought they would be effecting a great saving by giving Ireland nine-eightieths. But owing to the decrease in the population of Ireland and the increase in the population of England, the time came when nine-eightieths would give Ireland more than 10s. per head, and thereupon the Treasury based the grant on 10s. per head.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The only question before us is the alleged inequality in the treatment of Ireland in the matter of agricultural rating. It seems to me that the hon. Member is now arguing a much wider question.

*MR. KNOX said he would try to keep within the ruling of the Speaker. He would only say that as soon as the Treasury found that nine-eightieths did not suit them they changed the basis of the grant, and it was now based on 10s. per head.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): It was based ever since the commencement of the Act on 10s. per head; precisely the same demand that was made by Mr. Sexton.

*MR. KNOX said that Mr. Sexton had made a demand for 10s. a head but it was refused because it was thought at the time it would give Ireland more than nine-eightieths. Years went on and the Treasury found that 10s. a head would be cheaper, and thereupon they based the grant on that calculation. The second argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year was that there was no desire in Ireland for a reduction of rates. The right hon. Gentleman now knew that there was a desire in Ireland for the reduction of rates. In fact they had just as great a desire in Ireland for a reduction of rates as any Englishman could have. The right hon. Gentleman had arrived at the idea that there was no desire for a reduction of rates in Ireland because some small equivalent grants that went to Ireland had not been applied to the relief of rates. The reason of that was that the grants were so small that they would not have made any appreciable effect on the rates in Ireland. But in the case of the large sum now at stake there was no purpose for which they would sooner have it applied in Ireland than for the reduction of rates. The third argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year was that half the rates in Ireland were paid by the landlords, and that that system would prevent the application of the Agricultural Rating Act to Ireland. But the Treasury got over that difficulty in the case of Scotland. It was only when they would have to spend a little more money in Ireland that this difficulty as between landlords and tenants occurred to their ingenious minds. He was sure the Treasury would be glad to see them fighting over the question whether the money should go to the landlords or the tenants while they kept the money in their own pockets. For his own part he would be glad to see some of this money given to the landlords, and he was sure that many hon. Members from Ireland who sat opposite would be glad to see some of it go to the tenants, because they knew it would be for the good of the landlords if the tenants were prosperous, for the better off the tenants were, the better the rents would be paid. He would not allude to the Report of the Financial Relation Commission, for the injustice of which he now complained had been created since that Commission reported. At the same time the Report of that Commission increased the force of the Irish demand for equal treatment with England. Ireland was overtaxed. They could not deny, however they might attempt to explain it, that Ireland paid more in proportion to its taxable capacity than England, and in the light of that fact how mean their action appeared. They gave to the people on whom taxation pressed least heavily, but they denied to the people on whom taxation pressed most heavily, and they had the additional gratification of feeling that the richest were their constituents, and the poorest were the constituents of Members from Ireland. He thought the only satisfactory relief from the overpressure of taxation was the reduction of taxation. He should be prepared to say that it would be an advantage to Ireland if she had a separate Custom House and separate taxes, but it was not necessary to do so for the present purpose. He admitted what the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said in his Budget speech, that a grant in aid of rates was equivalent to a reduction of taxation. Therefore the Treasury, by giving Ireland this money in relief of their rates, would pro tanto relieve them from the burden of taxation. Of course it would not be a full equivalent. £500,000 a year was not an equivalent for three millions; but so far as it went it would be to the good, and he thought the people of Ireland would be glad to take the sum on account for the money which they were afterwards to receive. During the debate on the financial relations question, a good deal had been said as to the meaning of the words "exemptions and abatements" in the Act of Union. The clause in the Act of Union said the taxation in England and in Ireland was to be equal, subject to such exemptions and abatements in Ireland as circumstances might appear from time to time to demand. He had gone with care into the history of the words. They were not much discussed on the occasion of the Union between Ireland and Great Britain; but they were fully discussed on the occasion of the Union between England and Scotland. As a matter of fact, the Irish did not think the words were of any great importance. Those exemptions and abatements were only to come into practice when the Exchequers of the two countries were united, and as the Irish people did not think it probable that the Exchequers would be united for a long period, they had not given much attention to the meaning of the words. For the origin of the words they should, therefore, go to the history of the Union of England and Scotland. The English Commissioners demanded that the subjects of both nations should be subjected to the same burdens, excises, and taxes. To this the Scotch Commissioners demurred, and they obtained some concessions. In the first place they obtained a provision that the Land Tax of Scotland should be limited to £45,000. That was the abatement. In the second place, after agreeing to certain equal duties, they obtained exemption from certain burdens and excises within Scotland for a competent time, to be adjusted in the course of its trade for certain articles. That was the exemption. They further agreed that if the exemption should be found impossible, owing to the prejudice to English trade and manufactures, Scotland should, in the alternative, receive as an equivalent an annual compensation for the inequality of taxation. He contended that although equal treatment in the matter of agricultural rates would not be, in the literal sense, exemption or abatement, it might be accepted pro tanto as an equivalent. They made an appeal to the spirit rather than to the words of the Act of Union; but nevertheless, if the Government gave them what they asked for they would be to some extent carrying out the express provision of the Act of Union as to exemptions and abatements. There were some people who did not like to regard Ireland as a separate entity, and to those he would point out that the burden of which they complained affected not merely the country but the individual farmer in Ireland. Let them take the peasant in Donegal, who was employed chiefly in raising store cattle, which he sold in Scotland or England in competition with English and Scotch farmers, who also raised store cattle. The rates in Donegal averaged 5s. 6d. in the pound —perhaps a little more. If the Donegal farmer had the advantage of living in England he would get from the State 2s. 9d. in the pound to help him in the work of producing store cattle. The English farmers with whom he was competing got half their rates paid, but he did not. This Donegal peasant who competed with the English and Scotch farmers was farther from the markets, and lived in a worse climate than they did, and yet the Government added to his difficulties by making a grant of half the rates to the English farmer and refusing to give any relief to the Donegal peasant. He had to be content with what little satisfaction he could derive from knowing that a Board was to be set up in Dublin. [Ironical Irish cheers.] Was it not an inequality without parallel in the civilised world that they should give to one class of producer in one part of the country out of the joint Exchequer a grant to encourage him in his industry while refusing to give the same boon to another producer who paid the same taxes? Was there a parallel in Turkey itself to that injustice. [Laughter, and Irish cheers.] After making careful inquiries, he had arrived at the conclusion that the farmer in Donegal could not produce each year more than one head of cattle fit for the market to a valuation of £5. He was handicapped by not getting a relief which the English farmer got to the extent of 13s. 9d. on every store beast. Could it be said that the Government were meting out equal treatment to all parts of the United Kingdom? They refused to make any distinction in matters of taxation. Why were they not entitled to the same relief in Ireland as was given to English farmers and landlords? He ventured to say that they might search the records of history in vain to find any meaner action than this. The Government did not put off the relief of the English farmer until the Commission on the Incidence of Rates in Great Britain had reported. Why, then, should they put off the relief of the Irish farmer until the new Commission on the Financial Relations had reported? He could only understand one reason for this injustice, namely, that it suited the pockets of the Government; but if it suited their consciences as well as it suited their pockets, he would not give much for their consciences. [Ironical Irish cheers.] He begged to move the Motion.

*Mr. HORACE PLUNKETT (Dublin Co., S.) said that, in his opinion, the speech of the hon. and learned Member had not been one bit too long. He particularly desired to endorse the view that English Members should pay due regard to the absolute unity among Irish representatives upon this occasion. He did not fear that English Members would attribute that unity to mere greed for money from the British Exchequer. So bitter, unfortunately, had been the antagonism between the Irish representatives on the two sides of the House that they would be hardly likely to come together on a purely fiscal matter unless they had the honest conviction that those on the other side were right in their contention. This was the second time that this question had been raised, and, as on the former occasion, the Government now seemed to take refuge in a doubt as to whether their Measure of last year was for the relief of agriculture or for the reform of local taxation. The words of the Queen's Speech of last year absolutely decided the matter. That Speech read:—

> "I regret to say that the condition of agriculture is disastrous beyond any recent experience. Measures will be laid before you, of which the object will be to mitigate the distress under which the classes labour who are engaged in that industry."

He would point out that in these words there was no question of the relief of countries; there was to be relief of certain classes who were suffering from an economic crisis in a specified industry. If the Government honestly desired the Rating Act of last year to apply to Ireland they could adjust every difference there might be between the conditions of the two islands. It was not necessary to fall back upon the proportions of 80, 11, and 9. The result of that proportion was that Ireland received the one-tenth of her rates as against one-half paid in England. The hon. Member for Derry had clearly made out his case, that this was giving a bonus to English farmers, but he had omitted to say that there was a specific clause in the Act of Union which absolutely prohibited any bonuses being given in any of the three countries which would act disadvantageously as against the others He would not now refer to the attitude of the Government with regard to the financial relations, as he was anxious that the present question should be considered on its merits, but he would like to say a word with regard to the proposed allocation of whatever money was coming to them through the Agriculture and Industries Bill. In the Queen's Speech last year it was admitted that the interests of agriculture in Ireland were of paramount importance, and they were told that a Bill would be introduced in order to assist that industry; but would it be believed that the Government had diverted the money provided in accordance with the promise given in the Queen's Speech of last year, so that it should this year march round again like a stage army, and appear as a new gift to Irish industries. He should be glad to see a sum given to Ireland equivalent to that given to England and Scotland for educational facilities. He appealed to English Members to take the matter before the House seriously to heart. The relations between England and Ireland were very much concerned in the decision which might be come to that night. He had been at variance with the majority of the representatives of Ireland on the nature of those relations, and during the short time that he had been connected with public affairs in Ireland he had done his best to bring about a better state of feeling between the two countries. He had not, he admitted, been successful, and, in fact, it was borne in upon him every day that there seemed to be a hopeless incapacity on the part of Englishmen—[Nationalist cheers]—to understand Ireland or the Irish question, or for Irishmen to understand Englishmen. [Ministerial cheers.] He had done his utmost to assure his own countrymen that if there was one quality that Englishmen might boast of it was a desire to do justice. [Nationalist laughter.] It was not necessary for hon. Members opposite to laugh. He had already admitted that they disagreed on that point, and he was afraid that they would continue to do so. At the same time he was extremely anxious that the present Government should have an opportunity of backing up their supporters in Ireland, who were assiduously endeavouring to persuade their fellow-countrymen that not only were Englishmen endeavouring to do justice to Ireland, but intended to do it. A Nationalist friend told him the other day that they could never get justice from England unless they went with a landlord's head in one hand and a cow's tail in the other.—[Nationalist cheers and laughter]—but he still held that after all the Irish race was not incapable of coming to a better understanding with England, and he sincerely hoped that English Members of all Parties would assist them in enabling the English Government, and their supporters in Ireland to prove the justice of the position he had taken up. [Cheers.]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, there is one sentence in the Motion of the hon. Member for Derry to which I should like to call attention in passing, and that is the statement that the Agricultural Rating Act for England has given a benefit to the English farmer. We have not been accustomed to hear that language from the opposite side of the House; on the contrary, we have had definite statements on the other side from right hon. Gentlemen and many other speakers who addressed us last year—I am not quite sure I could not quote some expressions from the hon. Member for Derry himself, or at any rate from one of his leaders—[Ministerial laughter]—to the effect that the Act would not benefit the English farmer. The hon. Member now holds out that Act as a boon to the English farmer, and has founded on that statement a remarkable argument that if the same Act is not applied to Ireland the result will be that a bounty will be given to the English farmer as against the Irish farmer in the markets in which they compete. Well, I do not think I can go quite as far as the hon. Member in his view of the Act of last year. In my belief—and I have always said so—it will be a benefit to the English farmer certainly at first, probably for the whole time of its operation; but when fresh tenancies and created, especially if there should be a change in the present state of the market as between landlord and tenant in favour of the landlord, then, no doubt—I think it is admitted—the owner of the land will have an advantage. But at present I admit the hon. Member is justified in claiming that Act as a benefit to the English farmer. Is it a bounty? That argument would lead us to this, that we should never do anything for the advantage of any class of persons in England, Scotland, or Ireland, without doing precisely the same thing—quite apart from the fact whether the circumstances were different or not—for the same class of persons over the whole of the United Kingdom. Our contention is, and in that I am afraid I must differ from the hon. Member, that in this matter the circumstances of Ireland are different from those of England, and to my mind it would really be as absurd to hold out the Agricultural Rating Act of last year as a bounty to English as against Irish farmers as to say, for example, that the freedom of Irish farmers from rates for education or police and from land tax where a man occupies his own land, and matters of that kind, are a bounty to the Irish as against the English farmer. ["Hear, hear!"] You might almost go on at that rate to argue that to give the advantages which have been undoubtedly given by our whole code of Irish land legislation to the occupier of land in Ireland as compared with the occupier of land in the rest of the United Kingdom is a bounty to Irish farmers. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not think it necessary to dwell upon that part of the hon. Member's argument. He has discussed at great length the question he has brought before the House, though not at too great length, for I admit the ability of his speech. I wish he had not marred it by imputing to me—not personally, but to the Government—

*MR. KNOX: The system.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: And to the office I have the honour to hold, mean and other discreditable motives which I am sure do not enter into the matter in the least. If I could have seen last year that it was a fair thing, having regard to the past and having regard to the present, to propose for Ireland precisely the same kind of relief in agricultural rating as was proposed for England, I certainly should have done it irrespectively of the cost. ["Hear, hear!"] But what happened? The hon. Member himself has raised this matter before. When the Agricultural Rating Act was passing through this House, the hon. Member moved an Instruction to the Committee asking that the Act might be extended to Ireland. That was debated at considerable length. Several hon. Members from Ireland spoke in the Debate, and, after hearing the arguments, the House rejected the proposal by a very large majority. Why? Because, in the opinion of the great majority of the House, the hon. Member had entirely failed to prove that the circumstances were identical to which he wished to apply identical remedies. I think he has equally failed to-night. Let the House consider what has been the history of this question of local taxation. It has been a question which, since the day I entered Parliament, has been year after year brought before this House by representatives of agricultural constituencies in England. There was a very strong feeling in the English agricultural constituencies that the agricultural ratepayers, whether owners or occupiers, were unfairly assessed to local taxation as compared with their real ability to pay, and that the immunity of personal property was a great grievance. That matter was brought before the House year after year, and steps were taken, one after the other, to meet the demands that were made. In the meantime, the amount of personal wealth in this country largely increased, and the value of agricultural land largely diminished, and when the late Government assumed office the depression of agriculture in Great Britain was such, that they appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into that particular matter. The reference to that Royal Commission was not extended to Ireland. Why was it not extended to Ireland? Because, of course, in the opinion of the late Government agricultural depression did not exist in Ireland—[Irish laughter]—in the sense that it existed in England. Of course, if they had felt that the contrary was the case, they would have included Ireland in the reference. They did not; that is the simple fact. The Commission was appointed and reported, as hon. Members will recollect, in favour of relief to the occupiers of agricultural land in Great Britain from rates to an extent larger than was granted to them by the Agricultural Rating Act of last year; and Parliament acted upon that recommendation, on the ground that the occupiers of agricultural land, on account of the depressed condition of agriculture, ought to be relieved from the incidence of rating before any other ratepayer; and the case of other ratepayers was remitted for inquiry to the Royal Commission. Now what had been the previous practice in Parliament in regard to cases where relief had been given to English ratepayers? My right hon. Friend, as the hon. Member observed, introduced that practice in the year 1888. It was held by Parliament, and repeatedly acted upon, that when a certain proportion of Imperial revenue was intercepted from the common purposes of the United Kingdom and handed over to England, for the relief of local ratepayers, that an equivalent grant should be made to Scotland and to Ireland in the proportion of 80, 11, and 9, which should be expended for local purposes in those parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member now seems rather to group the cases of England and Scotland together, as if Ireland had equally a grievance against both of them in this matter. What happened in the case of Scotland? An equivalent grant in the old proportion of eleven-hundredths was given to Scotland under the Act which was passed last year for Scotland, and in the same way a grant of nine-hundredths was given to Ireland for Irish purposes. That was precisely the course that had been followed in previous years. Is that, assuming the practice of equivalent grants to be a fair one, an unfair course? I can show that the proportion of nine-hundredths, at any rate, is favourable to Ireland. Of course, the calculation was based upon the respective contributions of the three parts of the United Kingdom to the joint revenue. The proportion of the total revenue of the United Kingdom contributed by Ireland in the years 1895-96 was only 7·34 per cent., and therefore, on that basis, Ireland was a considerable gainer; and, again, if you were to take the sources of revenue which were diverted from Imperial to local purposes you would find that Ireland was even a greater gainer in that way. The sources of revenue were three—namely, a part of the probate or estate duty, on personalty, and a surtax, upon spirits and beer. In the year 1895-96, whereas Ireland only contributed 4·8 per cent. of the total probate duty on personalty, she received 9 per cent.—nearly double. She contributed 6·47 per cent. of the surtax upon beer, and received 9 per cent. She contributed 12·5 of the surtax upon spirits, and received 9 per cent., making a total receipt in 1895-96 for local purposes for Ireland of no less than £89,000 more than her contribution to these sources of revenue. I do not wish to attach too much importance to this, because the whole 9 per cent. was based on the total revenue of the country, of which, as I have shown, Ireland contributed only 7·34 per cent. But the gist of the hon. Member's Motion is this—he objects to equivalent grants altogether; he is not considering whether they are fair or not. He says that we ought not to have dealt with this matter by equivalent grants, but that we should have given to Irish farmers precisely the same form of relief we gave to English agricultural ratepayers. ["Hear, hear!"] Let me say on that, in the first place, that I demur to his view that there have been the same complaints with regard to local taxation in Ireland on agricultural land as there have been in England. The whole history of our Parliamentary Debates upon that subject, I believe, will show the contrary. The hon. Member himself admitted that whereas certain grants had been given to Ireland from the Imperial revenue for local purposes, some of those grants had, with the consent of the Irish Members, not been devoted to the relief of ratepayers, but had been devoted to other purposes altogether.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): We were never consulted.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: You were here.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: We protested, and you would not listen to us.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: That is not my recollection. My recollection is that the purposes to which these grants were devoted were assented to by the Irish Members.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: We continually kicked against the £10,000 for horse-breeding.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: At any rate, the fact is this—that in the year 1887, when a grant was made to the local authorities in Great Britain for the maintenance of highways in relief of ratepayers, a corresponding grant to Ireland was devoted to certain local industries and certain local public works. In 1888 the grant of £40,000 was not devoted to the relief of ratepayers, but was used, in the first place, as a reserve to meet the requirements of the Land Purchase Acts, and now is to go to the building of labourers' cottages. In 1890 the Irish share of the surtax on the beer and spirit duties was given directly for the purposes of elementary and intermediate education. That, at any rate, I think, shows that the claims of Irish ratepayers have not been in past years pressed upon Parliament in the same way as the claims of English ratepayers. Why is that? I cannot answer that question, though I confess it occurs to me that it may have been the case in the past that the rates of Ireland were not so high as the rates in England, or, possibly, the attention of Irish Members was directed to other matters. I merely refer to a fact. But now, it is said, there is another state of things, and in the view of the hon. Member, the most necessary purpose to which any grant from the Imperial funds can be devoted in Ireland is the relief of the agricultural ratepayer. I do not know whether that view is assented to or not by hon. Members from Ireland generally. If that be so, then, of course, that view will be very carefully considered by the Irish Government. I do not know what course the Irish Government may propose to take with regard to the £150,000 which has been allocated for Irish purposes.

*Mr. KNOX: The Irish Government will say that that is a Treasury matter.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: No, that is not a Treasury matter. The system of equivalent grants is a Treasury matter, but the mode in which the amount is to be dealt with is not a Treasury matter at all. It is a matter in which I imagine the Irish Government would be practically free from Treasury control and would desire to consider the wishes of the representatives for Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] But that, of course, is not what the hon. Member wants. What he wants is a good deal more. ["Hear, hear!"] He wants that £150,000 to be largely increased—[Nationalist cheers]—and that is the whole object of his Motion. Why should it be increased? The hon. Member spoke of the pressure of rates in Ireland. He made light of the English land tax, which is a very severe burden in many of the poorest agricultural parts of England, but with which I will not deal, as it does not fall upon the occupier, but upon the owner. But he went on to compare the valuation of Ireland with the valuation of England, and he said that the valuation of property for the purposes of rating was too high in Ireland and too low in England. I am quite confident of this—that when I had a special connection with the Irish Government, which now is some years ago, the valuation of property in Ireland was considerably below the real value.

*MR. KNOX: That was in 1875.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: And in 1886. Of course, things may have changed. It may be that in some parts, perhaps in many parts, of Ireland, Griffith's valuation, as it is called, is at present higher than the value as fixed by the Land Commissioners. ["Hear, hear!"] But I do not think that if there be any real desire on the part of hon. Members for Ireland that the valuation of that country should be revised, they will find Her Majesty's Government at all backward in associating themselves with that request. [Cheers.]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): It would cost a quarter of a million to do it.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, but it might be worth a quarter of a million to have a revision of the valuation. [Cheers.] At any rate, I am perfectly prepared to take the matter into consideration with a real desire to carry something out, if we had any understanding that it would be favourably received by the Members for Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] It can be, so far as I can see, no object to anybody, and certainly no object to the Treasury, that the taxes and rates of Ireland should be levied upon an unfair valuation. ["Hear, hear!"] But with regard to the valuation in England, it is not my experience, and I have some little experience in that matter, that the valuation for rating purposes in agricultural districts is at present too low. ["Hear, hear!"] I have known many cases where it is too high—[cheers]—and where it has been found impossible to induce the assessment committees to take what I may call a fair view of the real value of agricultural property in its present depreciated condition. I do not think, therefore, that on that basis the hon. Member can make out any case for Ireland. But he has compared the rate in the pound which is paid by ratepayers in Ireland and in England, and he has put on one side the 2s. 4d. in the pound which was calculated as the average rate on agricultural land to which the Agricultural Rating Act applied, and compared that with the 3s. 3d. in the pound which he has calculated as the average amount of rates paid by ratepayers in Ireland. I would submit that that comparison is entirely fallacious.

*MR. KNOX: I did not say as the total amount. The average would be very much larger. I have taken the average paid by agricultural ratepayers.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think the hon. Member has any real basis for arriving at that conclusion. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not know how he has separated the portion of the poor rate which is paid by the landlord from the portion which is paid by the occupier, because his Motion only refers to that portion of the poor rate which in Ireland is paid by the occupier? How has he separated, with regard to the grand jury cess, the rate in the pound on purely agricultural lands from the rate in the pound on buildings, on houses in towns, to which the grand jury cess, of course, applies, and on other property which is not agricultural land at all.

*MR. KNOX: The cess only applies in a very partial degree to the towns.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think the grand jury cess applies very largely to the towns. ["Hear, hear!"] That is my recollection. I have been quite unable myself to arrive at any real estimate of the average rate in the pound on agricultural land in Ireland which could fairly be compared with the 2s. 4d., which was the average estimated rate on agricultural land in England. I do not think the House can conclude anything from the 3s. 3d. in the pound or the figures of 1s. 5½d. for the average poor rate and 2s. 1d. for the average grand jury rate to which the hon. Member has referred. Then, again, he has referred to the specially high rates, in certain baronies or electoral divisions in the poorest parts of Ireland, and he asserted that those high rates were in no case due to the rates levied under the Light Railways Act or other corresponding legislation. I think the hon. Member is mistaken.

*MR. KNOX: I am sorry to again interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I did not say so. I said that the particular figures, which I gave on the authority of Mr. Robinson, who is a Local Government Board official in Ireland, did not include the light railway rates as Mr. Robinson himself said. I did not make the general statement.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am quite sure, having looked through the return obtained by the hon. Member for East Mayo a year or two ago, that I could put my finger on baronies or electoral divisions in Ireland where the rates are heaviest, the greater part of which would be due to the cost of light railways or something of that kind. The hon. Member spoke of the Belmullet Union and other unions in the West. I am afraid it would be found that the excessive rates in those unions are directly due to mismanagement which would not be tolerated on this side of the Channel—[cheers and Nationalist cries of "No!"]—and I do not think we can fairly be expected to give relief in cases of that kind. [Cheers, and an IRISH MEMBER: "That is not so."] I contend, as I have already said, that the circumstances of Ireland with regard to agricultural depression cannot be compared with those of England. I do not say for a moment that there have not been bad seasons in Ireland, when the occupiers have suffered. I do not say for a moment that there have not been fluctuations in the prices of stock, which, when low, they have also suffered from. But what has been the real cause of what we call agricultural depression in England—that agricultural depression into which the late Government found it necessary to institute a special inquiry? Why, unquestionably, the low price of wheat, and England is a wheat-growing country, and Ireland is not. ["Hear, hear!"] That is really at the bottom of the whole matter. I know, with regard to farms in several parts of England, it is no easy matter when a farm is vacant to obtain a new tenant. At any rate, it is not an easy matter to obtain a tenant who is prepared to pay, not a high tenant-right, but the ordinary payments for acts of husbandry and compensation for unexhausted improvements which, under any proper system of agriculture, must be paid by an incoming tenant to the outgoing tenant. What is the cause of the high price of tenant-right in Ireland I must leave to those better acquainted with Ireland than myself to determine; but, at any rate, the occupation of a farm in that country must be worth something if sensible people like Irishmen are willing to pay great prices for those rights. [Laughter and cheers.] Could you find anybody to do it in England? I do not believe you could. ["Hear, hear!"] In England, again, we settle the rents by agreement between landlord and tenant in what is ordinarily known as the bargaining of the market, and the result is, as we have seen, that rents practically everywhere, have gone down, and in many parts have gone down enormously. ["Hear, hear!"] In Ireland you have to maintain a special system of land legislation in order to protect the tenant against the bargaining of the market and to prevent the landlord getting from him a higher rent than Parliament has considered he ought in fairness to pay. The circumstances of the two countries in this matter are as different as could by any possibility be conceived—[cheers]—and, that being so, I fail to understand how the hon. Member can with fairness argue that identical remedies ought to be applied to them. ["Hear, hear!"] If it be the case that the incidence of local taxation on the ratepayers generally, or on the agricultural ratepayers specially, in Ireland has become a greater grievance than it was in the years to which I have alluded, there is an opening of which Irishmen can avail themselves. There is a Royal Commission now sitting—[ironical laughter]—to inquire into the incidence of local taxation. That inquiry extends to Ireland. Ireland is ably represented on that Commission, and if they make any recommendations with regard to local taxation in Ireland, those recommendations will come with great weight to Her Majesty's Government and to Parliament. But at present what I feel is this—

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Cannot you appoint another to upset it?

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: We have appointed that Commission ourselves, and the remark of the hon. Member is hardly to the point. ["Hear, hear!"] It is not asked that we should really give identical treatment to Ireland in this case. My right hon. Friend the Member for County Dublin referred to the Bill of the Chief Secretary for establishing a Board of Agriculture and handing over to that Board the sum of £150,000 a year which was allocated to Ireland as an equivalent grant by the Act of last Session. My hon. Friend desires, I believe, that much larger funds should be handed over to the Board of Agriculture. His desire is that Ireland should have identical treatment with regard to the relief of farmers from agricultural rating, but should not have identical treatment with regard to the funds to be expended in Ireland by the Board of Agriculture. The Imperial Treasury is to pay with both hands.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Give us back our own money. [Laughter.]

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Why is this request made? It is made, as the hon. Member's speech shows, because of the report of the majority of the Financial Relations Commission. He believes, as the majority of the Commission assert, that a large debt is due from Great Britain to Ireland in order to remedy overtaxation. He believes, contrary to all the Irish Members of that Commission, that it would be a set-off to overtaxation if additional grants were made in this way to Ireland. That is a view which he is perfectly entitled to hold, but we have not been able to admit the correctness of that view. We have not been able to accept the finding of the majority of the Royal Commission as to the overtaxation of Ireland. We have not been able to admit that Great Britain owes a debt in this matter to Ireland. On the contrary we propose that the subject should be further inquired into, and we do not stand in this matter on the same ground as hon. Members opposite. We are asked not merely to give to Irish agricultural ratepayers the same treatment as is given to English agricultural ratepayers in other circumstances, but also to give to Ireland grants for other purposes, of a much larger amount, which would never have been required or asked for in England. We are unable to adopt that course. My contention is that this Motion which has been moved as an Amendment to the Budget, is contrary to the past practice of Parliament in dealing with these matters of local taxation as between the three countries. It is not based on any proved necessity, but is based on the view that there is a great debt due by Great Britain to Ireland—a view which has not been accepted by the House of Commons. [Cheers.]

Mr. E. CARSON (Dublin University) said that when the Motion with reference to the Financial Relations Commission was before the House he supported the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] He did so for the same reason as he intended to oppose them that evening. On that occasion it was argued that Ireland was a separate entity—that Ireland was entitled to separate financial treatment. As a Unionist, he could not, and would not, accept that view. He was well aware that there had been many occasions during recent years upon which the House had treated Ireland as a separate entity. It was to that he attributed the isolated position which Irish Unionists held in Ireland, because if they looked back at the past history of this Parliament in relation to Ireland they found that it was whenever Ireland was so treated Irish Unionists were deserted by English Members who otherwise sympathised with them. It was also because they had been so treated that many of the fundamental principles of the Act of Union had been set at naught. By that treatment they had been robbed of their Church, and now day by day they were robbing their landlords of their property. So far as he was concerned, he would be no party to the Separatist doctrines which had been laid down with such force by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. [Opposition cheers.] Nor would he any longer be prepared to submit to being treated at one moment as a member of this great country, and at another moment as a member of something entirely different. All they asked in this case was that they should be treated exactly as if they were a part of this country—that the County Kerry should receive exactly the same treatment as Essex or Norfolk. He had listened with great disappointment to the arguments of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had not refuted a single argument put forward by the Mover of the Resolution. Was it disputed that there were baronies in Kerry which paid 10s. in the pound on the valuation of the agricultural rating and something like 13s. in Mayo? The poorer the district the higher the rates, and the proofs adduced by the hon. and learned Member had not been challenged. The answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was twofold; he said that the circumstances of Ireland and England were different. Their only difference was in the amount of the aggravated distress existing in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Then it was said that there was not the same amount of agricultural distress in Ireland as in England; but if this was so, what did the Government intend to do in relation to their own Sub-Commissioners, who were daily cutting down rents 60 to 70 per cent. under Acts to which the Government were a party? It was further said, "Look at the large sums being paid for tenant right in Ireland." What was the reason? The reason was because land in Ireland was the sole employment of the people. [Nationalist cheers.] The second argument employed was their old friend the equivalent grant. The meaning of this was that they were not to consider the circumstances or the wants of the country, but the amount of contribution to certain matters of Imperial revenue. If that argument held good—if they were still a United Kingdom, which he was beginning to doubt—[Opposition cheers]—what became of the statement constantly being made as to the great advantages to the poorer country forming a portion of the wealthier? [Nationalist cheers.] The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a separatist tendency. The question was really a simple one. Local taxation on agricultural land was higher in Ireland than in England; but the grievance was not to be met. The argument had been used that in course of time the grant under the Agricultural Rating Act of last year might find its way into the pockets of the English landlords. There would, however, be no chance of anything of that kind occurring in Ireland, because there the rents were fixed by the Land Courts, which would intervene to prevent the money from going into the landlords' pockets. Both sides in that House were always professing to be the friends of Ireland, but when it came to a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, each side endeavoured to take as much as it could from that country. [Nationalist cheers.] The policy of both sides for relieving the occupiers of land in Ireland was simply to take another slice off the interest of the landlords. That was a policy which cost the British Exchequer nothing. He should certainly support this Resolution. The refusal of the Government to entertain the claim advanced unanimously by the representatives of Irish constituencies would cause grave disappointment in Ireland. He was anxious to hear what the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Irishmen who had the honour of being associated with him as Members of the Government had to say on this subject. ["Hear, hear!"] He had watched the flow of public opinion in Ireland, and everywhere, even in newspapers which were avowedly supporters of the Government, the same language of disapprobation was used with regard to their conduct in not extending to Ireland the benefits of the English Rating Act. Since this Government had come into power, the position of Unionism in Ireland had not improved —[Nationalist cheers]—and the attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would render that position worse. There was only one way to maintain the union between the two countries, and that was by doing absolute justice to Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) observed that the reductions of rent in Ireland, which his right hon. and learned Friend had always stoutly opposed, ought to be viewed by him as bounties to the Irish farmers as against the English farmers. The right hon. and learned Gentleman contended that Kerry, for example, ought to be treated in precisely the same way as Essex was.

But was Kerry prepared to give up the special advantages which it possessed in common with other Irish counties in connection with local taxation? Was Kerry prepared to pay half the cost of its own police, and proportionately as much as Essex did for education? The hon. Member who had proposed this Resolution had referred to the unanimity among the Irish Members who were making this attack upon the British Exchequer, but he wanted to know whether the regular Opposition were similarly unanimous on the subject. Were they anxious that the operation of a Measure which they denounced last year as wrong and vicious in principle should be extended to Ireland? There was a certain want of authentic facts and figures on which to argue this question out. The Financial Relations Commission ought to have inquired into the subject of local taxation as well as into that of Imperial taxation. But they did not do so because they knew that England had a good case. Sir E. Hamilton, however, tried to force the subject upon their attention, and one or two questions were asked about the advantages enjoyed by ratepayers in Ireland. Mr. Sexton, referring to local taxation revenue, said:—

> "No doubt, according to the Treasury calculation, Ireland contributes £250,000 and gets £320,000, so that there would appear to be an advantage to Ireland of £70,000 a year."

Sir E. Hamilton replied, "I think those are the figures." The Motion presented to the Exchequer a little Bill of between £500,000 and £600,000 a year. Its supporters overlooked the fact that there was a good set-off against that. The Irish police cost £1,500,000, and if that expense were incurred in England half of it would be defrayed by the local ratepayers. [Mr. LOUGH: "The English ratepayers would appoint them, but the Irish do not!"] Taking the figure agreed by the Financial Relations Commission as the figure which ought to be charged to Ireland for police, if paid for on the same basis as in England, he found that it was £600,000, and of that the ratepayers would have had to pay one-half, or £300,000. Then as to education, the ratepayers of England and Wales paid nearly £4,000,000 annually in rates for elementary education on a population of $30\frac{3}{4}$ millions. On the same basis the Irish ratepayers, on their population of $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions, ought to have paid £569,000. They actually paid £7,287, or about £562,000 short. He thought that these items showed a sufficient set-off against the claim now made. ["Hear, hear!"] The whole system of rating in Ireland was entirely different to that in England. In the case of small tenancies under £4 the whole of the rates were paid by the owner, and in many cases of tenancies above that amount the rates were divided. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown that when it came to a question of paying, the share of Ireland was 7 2-3rds per cent., but when it came to receiving, Ireland drew 9 per cent. of the money distributed. To anyone but an Irishman that would be a good bargain. ["Hear, hear!"] It had been stated that the rates in Ireland were going up. The statistical abstract showed that in 1889-90, the first year after the new arrangement of local taxation made by the present First Lord of the Admiralty, the rates in England and Wales amounted to £27,720,000, and that they rose in 1893-4 to £31,228,000, an increase of £4,500,000. The rates in Ireland in 1889-90 amounted to £2,991,062, and in 1893-4 to £2,993,032, or an increase of about £2,000. That surely disposed of the idea that the rates in Ireland were rising in an alarming way. If any farmer at all had a bounty operating in his favour, it was the Irish farmer, who had all the advantages conferred on him by the Land Acts. The truth of the matter was that the Irish farmer wanted to keep all the advantages he possessed at present, and also to come in for a share of the little advantage the English farmer might get. They wanted to keep all the preferential treatment they received in the matters of police and education, and also to share any crumb of assistance the English farmer received. ["Hear, hear!"] A very quaint objection was raised that the £40,000 a year given to Ireland under the County Councils Act was used to set in motion the Irish Land Acts. This motion was made in favour of the Irish farmer. That £40,000 was intended to help all the ratepayers in Ireland, but the agricultural population got hold of it and used it for their own purposes. For the reasons he had stated he should certainly oppose this Motion, and he hoped that all English Members, not only on account of the interest of which the hon. Member for Londonderry had spoken, but also from a desire to do justice to Ireland and some little justice to England, would join him in his opposition. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. J. A. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said that the three Irish Members who had already spoken had all got some particular grievance in connection with the action of the Government. The mover of the Motion objected, of course, to the very existence of the Government, and to everything the Government did. The hon. Member for the County of Dublin had also a grievance of his own, and he was followed by the Member for Dublin University, who had a great grievance with regard to the shocking treatment the Government meted out to his friends and protegés, the Irish landlords. The hon. Member also referred to the ancient grievance of the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He was himself in the position of being an Irish Member without a grievance as far as the Government was concerned up to the present. He came to the House anxious to hear all that could be said on both sides of this question. He naturally expected to hear a powerful and complete reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the hon. Member for Londonderry; but as far as he could judge, the right hon. Gentleman gave no answer to any single portion of the speech of the hon. Member. The hon. Member who had just sat down had used a considerable number of arguments they were accustomed to hear in reference to this matter. He had himself used some of those arguments when speaking on a platform in his constituency of a Member of the present Government. He was trying to show the excellent financial position of Ireland, and the excellent treatment Ireland was receiving in this matter. He was satisfied with the speech himself, but whether that satisfaction extended to the bulk of the audience or not he did not know. It certainly did not extend to the hon. Member for the division—[laughter]—because he took him to task and told him he was all wrong. The hon. Member was interested in this matter, although a Member of the present Government, and he pointed out a number of matters which set him thinking, and he had not used the same arguments again. [Laughter.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply to the hon. Member for Londonderry, said that the Act of last year would not be a boon to the tenant, because when present tenancies ended, it would be a boon to the landlords. The contention of the supporters of the Motion was that it was a boon to the Englishman, and they were not concerned with the question whether it was a boon to the landlord or the tenants. They contended that an Act on the same lines should be passed for Ireland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer went on to say that the hon. Member for Londonderry might as well argue that the benefits the Irish farmer enjoyed under the Land Acts were a bounty to the Irish farmer against the English farmer. Those who represented agricultural constituencies in Ireland did not look upon this at all as a bounty to the Irish farmer, but merely as a provision to force Irish landlords to do towards their tenants what English landlords had done and were doing with regard to their tenants. The Chancellor of the Exchequer denied that there had been the same complaints with regard to local taxation in Ireland as there had been in England. But what did it matter whether there had been the same volume of complaint or not? The question was, where did justice lie? Where was the right in this question? Seeing that all the Irish leaders and all their followers of every party, creed, and class, were at one in this matter, the reference of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a disunited Irish Nationalist Party recoiled upon himself. It showed that there was some justice in the claim they made. The depression in England, it was said, was owing to the fall in the price of wheat, but if that circumstance demanded special and exceptional treatment, surely the fact of the entire disappearance in Ireland of the flax crop, which 15 or 20 years ago was the great sheet-anchor of the Irish farmer, pointed no less forcibly to the extending of similar treatment to the farmers of Ireland. The old argument had again been trotted out—the price that Irish farmers were foolish enough to give for small pieces of land here and there. In Ireland there was not merely land hunger, but the strong desire on the part of the farmer to "square" his farm, and if a bit of land had been taken out of his farm, and proved an eyesore, he would give almost any price in order to get it back. But this did not apply to good-sized farms. They were almost unsaleable. He knew dozens of farms of that character that had been put up again and again, and were at this moment unsaleable. [Nationalist cheers.] He knew the case of a farm where the buildings cost £1,500, all in the finest state of repair, and £300 was the largest price that could be got for the entire farm, buildings and all. It might as well be said, because hundreds of men were found giving good rents for chambers in the Temple, when they would get perhaps only one brief in three years, that, therefore, the whole legal profession were earning an enormous income amongst every one of its members. No; the notorious fact was that Irish farmers were barely existing at all throughout the country. —[Nationalist cheers]—and were it not that they lived in a way that no Englishman of any class could possibly live, they would disappear from the country altogether. So he would earnestly request the Government to put aside once for all the argument drawn from the price given for odd patches of land here and there. It was a piece of insanity, a craze, and could not be justified. The Chancellor of the Exchequer further said he could not find that the rating of Ireland was unfair. Well, the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry was still unanswered. There had not been one single sentence or argument to it from beginning to end of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech. If it could be and was answered, no one would be more delighted to follow the Government into the lobby. If the speech of the hon. and learned Member had contained but one sentence it would require a very elaborate answer indeed. It was this, that while Mayo and Kerry were paying 10s. and 13s. respectively in the pound, Essex was considered to be paying far too large an amount when paying 4s., 5s., and 6s. They needed from the Government an answer to that statement. When they showed that the rate paid in poor Irish counties was 10s. in the pound, and in the worst English county, Essex, the rate was 4s. 6d., they could not continue to say that it was all talk that came from Ireland. They had not on this occasion Irishmen set against Irishmen, but they had all the Irish Members and all the Irish people speaking with one voice. Here they had the landlords' representatives and the tenants' representatives saying the same thing. He asked the English Members around him to look into this matter, and not follow the Government blindly into the Lobby —a Government which he admired and respected — but to judge the matter on its merits. He believed that the Government were taking a wrong view on this question. No one could doubt his loyalty to the Unionist cause. He asked his hon. Friends to consider the fact that ten or twelve Unionist Members who had spoken for the English Members at the Election, joined in supporting this Motion. There had been money demands made from Ireland that were foolish, and they were laughed out of the House, but this was not a case of that kind. He said to his hon. Friends: "If you are satisfied that the Government have answered the speech of the Member for Derry, by all means vote with the Government; but unless you think that that has been done, then do not follow the Government into the Lobby on a matter of this sort." The President of the Local Government Board said last year that he was afraid the income of the farmers was either nothing or inadequate. This far more than applied to the Irish farmers, who were many of them, near the verge of starvation. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore, these words of the President of the Local Government Board applied with ten-fold greater force to Ireland. The Member for Derry quoted three reasons for the Bill of last year: the first was under pressure of Imperial taxation; secondly, the heavy pressure of rates on farmers; and thirdly, that agriculture was in a depressed condition. Could the right hon. Gentleman show that these conditions did not apply to Ireland? It was said that a large number of people were desirous for a University, but a large number did not want a University; therefore, speaking as one of the Unionist Members, he said, "Keep your University for the present, at any rate, and apply the money to this matter of taxation which is pressed upon you." As to the proposed Board of Agriculture, he failed to see how a Board in Dublin, however good it might be, or however much money they placed at its disposal, could deal with the most pressing difficulties that existed in many parts of Ireland. He did not agree with the wholesale denunciation of the Government by the Member for Dublin University, for many of the Unionists considered that the Land Act was on the right lines. He hoped the Government would back up that Act by a generous treatment of this question. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. C. A. CRIPPS (Gloucester, Stroud) assured his hon. and learned Friend that the English Members were anxious to do equal justice to Ireland. Were the conditions as to rates in Ireland constituted on the same basis as the rates in England, and were they so constituted that they could fairly compare the rating of the two countries? There was a crucial difference between them, and this was the fallacy which underlay the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry. Speaking as a Member of the Royal Commission on this subject, he cordially hoped that when their labours came to a conclusion they should be able to advise a system which would operate equally over every part of the United Kingdom... If they could do that, then it would be possible, instead of adopting the principle of the equivalent grant, they could adopt the principle advocated by the hon. Member for Londonderry for every part of the three Kingdoms. If the amount of the equivalent grant for Ireland was not sufficient, then he would say let it be adjusted and enlarged. ["Hear, hear!"] But what was the complaint on the present occasion? It was not a complaint of the injustice of the equivalent grant as regarded the rating question. He reminded hon. Members from Ireland that the Rating Act was passed for a limited time. [An hon. Member: "It was promised that it should be continued!"] He regarded that Act, not as a matter of relief to the tenant or the landlord, but as the first step of reform dealing with an industry which had been subjected to a particular strain. They, the English Unionists, had taken great trouble to make themselves acquainted with this rating question in Ireland, fully determined that there should be a fair adjustment between the two countries. In England the rate was adjusted from year to year, except in London; but there was no such system in Ireland, where Griffiths' valuation, carried out gradually between 1850 and 1865, prevailed. No doubt the system operated in favour of the South of Ireland as compared with the North, owing to the change of prices during the years which intervened. He did not think his hon. Friend would say they should apply to Griffith's system the same principle which they applied to the system here, where the rate was adjusted every year. He denied that the amount of the rate in the pound was a fair test as to the burden of local taxation unless they associated with that the basis on which the rate was made. What were the items considered in connection with Griffiths' valuation? Wheat, oats, barley, beef, mutton, bacon and flax. Wheat was not now cultivated to any considerable extent in Ireland; but all the rest of the articles he had mentioned were worth per cwt. more now than when Griffiths' valuation was made. That was a complete answer to the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry that the mere fact that rates were 13s. in the pound was sufficient to establish his case. The basis of valuation in Ireland had not been reformed since 1850, when prices on which the valuation was made were all lower than they were now. As to the speech of the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, to whom every Unionist Member listened with respect on all Irish questions, the right hon. and learned Member had overstated his case on one point. No doubt, the Irish landlords had been treated somewhat harshly and ungenerously; but the right hon. and learned Member forgot that while in England rents had fallen rapidly between 1882 and 1897, in Ireland the operation of the Land Act of 1881 had been to keep rents at a level which they would not have maintained if ordinary economic conditions had come into play. The unfortunate result was, that having been so kept up for 15 years, a readjustment naturally involved a very large reduction, which bore hardly on the landlord, though previously to the adjustment it was the tenant who suffered. It was a great pity that land in Ireland was not treated, as in England, on an economic basis. The fact that by the Act of 1881 Irish rents had been kept up while English rents had fallen, in some cases from 70 to 90 per cent., was the severest satire on the passing of an Act which did away with the ordinary economic considerations. The right hon. Member for Dublin University, however, had dwelt only on those effects of the Act which had been harsh to the landlords; he had left out of account what was favourable to the landlords. Assuming that the agricultural depression had been as severe in Ireland as in England—and he did not think that was the case, because Irish agriculture depended less on arable land—that did not make it fair to apply the same Rating Act to both countries, until the basis of valuation was made the same in both countries. When that was done, he hoped that there would be one rating law for the whole of the United Kingdom. But at present there was no reason why the principle of equivalent grants should be departed from on the present occasion. If justice were to be done, there must not be a pretence of similarity where none actually existed. The differences of the conditions obtaining in the two countries must be taken into account. He had not heard it said that the equivalent grant was too small; and, on behalf of Unionist Members, he protested against the assertion that in supporting the Government on this occasion they were doing anything but obtaining equal justice and equal treatment for England and Ireland. [Cheers.]

MR. SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.) said that the vote of the House on this Resolution would be a test vote. If the majority voted against the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry, it would show how vain it was for the Irish representatives of all opinions to agree in order to obtain what they believed to be a measure of simple justice. In every part of Ireland there had been meetings pressing upon the Government the extension to Ireland of the English Agricultural Rating Bill. Almost every grand jury passed a resolution to that effect at the last assizes, and almost every municipal body of importance had passed a similar resolution. On April 30th a great meeting was held at the Dublin Mansion House, at which prominent men of every shade of opinion were present, and a resolution was passed urging the Government to extend the Rating Bill to Ireland, and calling upon every Irish representative to support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry. Pronounced Unionist Members of the House had supported this claim, and, with the exception of the official Members, every Irish Member supported it. The whole case of the hon. and learned Member for Stroud was that the basis of valuation was different in England and in Ireland. He assumed that Griffith's valuation was an under-valuation, but anyone who had any experience of Irish affairs knew that, whatever that valuation might have been from 1850 up to 1860, it was now considerably higher than the actual value of the land. There was another fallacy in the hon. and learned Member's contention. The very fact that the valuation in England was being constantly revised made that valuation a better test of the actual rating power of a farm. In Ireland, however, Griffiths' valuation was made a standard of taxation, so that the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was really opposed to the view he put forward. There was one thing in the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, however, which he heard with considerable satisfaction, and it was the first time he had heard it proclaimed by an hon. Member opposite that the rents fixed under the Act of 1881 were excessive. It was generally contended that they were ruinous to the landlords, but now they had it admitted that these rents were excessive. Passing from the speech to which they had just listened, he said that to wander into the question of the financial relations of England and Ireland, or into that of whether Ireland ought to be treated as a separate entity, only confused the issue. The effect of this Resolution being carried and made a basis of legislation would be to assist all classes in Ireland, and that was the reason there was such singular unanimity amongst all the Irish Members on this subject. The more important local taxes in Ireland were the poor rate and the county cess. The poor rate was payable in equal moieties by the landlord and tenants. In cases where the valuation was under £4 the whole of the poor rate fell upon the landlord. The whole of the county cess, prima facie, fell on the tenant; there might be rare cases in which the county cess was divided, but speaking generally, it fell on the tenant, and it would be an enormous boon to the tenants if they were placed on the same footing as their fellow-tenants in England, and if the consolidated funds or the Exchequer were to relieve them of half the rates. The question was not whether the sum to be allocated should be £733,000 or £120,000. It was vain for any person knowing Ireland to argue that there was not the greatest possible depression in that country—there was much greater depression there than in England. Anyone who drove through that country, anyone who dealt with the people, whether as a professional man or otherwise, knew that the struggle for existence in Ireland by the farmers was painful to witness; and in a great assembly, in that, the greatest Council of the world, it was simply vain to have it questioned that there was greater distress in Ireland now, and had been for many years, than in any part of England. The standard of living in Ireland was so low that the people were able to exist upon what the English tenant would starve upon. Were these people always to continue to live in that way? If English representatives were satisfied of that which they should be satisfied, viz., that the depression in Ireland was a growing evil, let them do simple justice to Ireland by giving the same relief to tenants in Ireland that was extended last year to England, and to some extent to the tenants in Scotland. The rates in the County Kerry, exclusive of the railway rates, were 7s. or 8s. in the pound, and was it proposed to give to Kerry tenants and to the tenants of Mayo, whose rates were as high as 12s. in the pound, relief by setting up a mockery of a Board of Agriculture in Ireland. Were the poor creatures who were hardly able to scrape out of the worn-out soil an existence to be put off by having professors and lecturers going through the country preaching how they could get a means of livelihood from the wretched soil and bogs where they lived? Admit the principle, that the tenant, or whoever paid the rates, should be relieved of a moiety of those rates, and let it afterwards be discussed what was a proper standard of relief.

On the return of Mr. Speaker, after the usual interval,

Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.) said the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry had made an unanswerable speech, and those who had followed him on the opposite side had evaded the main points at issue. He had never heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer to worse advantage than on the present occasion, and the reason was that he had a very bad case. It might be imagined from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that, although there was admittedly great depression in this country, that depression did not extend to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman expressed, moreover, an opinion that there was no particular grievance in Ireland with regard to over-taxation, because the Irish people had not made their voices heard in any remarkable way on the subject. The inference to be drawn from that was that, no matter what grievance Ireland might have, it would not be recognised and taken into account until there was a vigorous agitation in the country on the subject, as was the case when rents were not acknowledged to be unreasonable until the country was almost convulsed with agitation. He did not think a very much worse lesson could be given to the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman said that no claim had ever been made, and he cited sums of money that had been allocated to Ireland. They had very many wants in Ireland, and it was true that when money had been allocated they had endeavoured to meet the most pressing want of the moment, such as the education of the people, or the erection of cottages for labourers. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman, with his knowledge of Ireland, would acknowledge that the people of their country had been housed in a condition not seen in any other civilised country, and that they could not have put the wretched, paltry sum given to them from Imperial sources to better use than by alleviating the condition of these people and giving them decent houses to live in. It could not surely be argued that over-taxation was not felt as a grievance in Ireland, because they had assisted these people in their desperate plight. The right hon. Gentleman said that the cases of Great Britain and Ireland were dissimilar, and quoted in proof the absence of the cultivation of wheat in the latter country. But what were the facts? Exclusive of woods and plantations, they had in Great Britain at present about 30 millions of acres under cultivation, while the cultivated area in Ireland at present, exclusive of woods and plantations, was 14,852,000 acres. The assessment valuation of great Britain was 39 millions for agricultural purposes, in Scotland it was six millions, and in Ireland ten millions. If they took the actual acreage, Ireland was entitled to 50 per cent. of the remission that was made in Great Britain; and if they took the assessable value, Ireland was entitled to a remission of from 18 to 20 per cent. And yet, although they were entitled to a sum of £750,000, they were only to get £150,000, with which sum it was proposed to found a Board in Ireland. Many of them thought that they had too many Boards in Ireland already. All acknowledged that these Boards were utterly unrepresentative, and did not possess the confidence of the people. When, some years ago, it was found necessary to found a Board in this country, they did not look to the local rates in order to effect their purpose. But when Ireland was concerned, it was said that the local rates should bear the cost of founding and equipping this Board. He pointed out that, although the population of Ireland was steadily decreasing, the local taxation was increasing. That was an unhappy state of things, but it existed nevertheless. Various causes had been assigned for it, amongst them emigration. Agriculture in Ireland was in a far worse condition than in England. Large towns, which in England were such an advantage to a large radius of country round, were few in Ireland. The bulk of the people were poor and led an existence few English people could understand. In England there were large industries which did not exist in Ireland, and more than 65 per cent. of the population lived solely by agriculture. The Members from Ireland maintained that they had an unanswerable case. They did not ask for any particular favour, but merely for their rights. It used to be said that Ireland was "the spoiled child of the Treasury." But he considered that she had been the "despoiled child." Ireland was taxed in every way and given little in return. It was a happy omen that all sections of Irish Parliamentary representation were united on this subject. They put the case of Ireland before the House. If they did not grant it they would play into their hands in Ireland; if they granted it they would be doing a simple act of justice. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said that if the strength of a case was to be judged by the weakness of the reply made to it then the case that had been presented by the hon. and learned Member for Derry was a very strong one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was second to no one in the House in his power of framing an argument, and in his lucidity in expressing it, but it was the opinion, not confined to one side of the House, that he had completely failed to answer the case put forward by the Member for Derry. What were the extraordinary assumptions they were asked to make? One was that it was questionable whether the rebate of half the rate was a boon to the English occupier.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said it was not a bounty.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: But a boon given to the English agriculturist which was not given to the Irish agriculturists, who worked under parallel circumstances, must be a bounty. It was a boon to the English agriculturist, and was intended when the Bill was introduced to be so. The President of the Board of Agriculture, when introducing the Bill, used these words:—

> "This is a Bill to give relief from agricultural depression. We trust and believe the proposal may and will do something to arrest the progress and lessen the load of that depression which is crushing the very life out of the chief industry of the country, and give some measure of encouragement to those who against hope are still gallantly struggling against that depression."

This and many other quotations which he could give showed that it was the deliberate intention of the Government to put this money straight into the pocket of the English agricultural occupier. But, then, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked them seriously to believe that while the agricultural depression in England and Scotland warranted the Agricultural

Rating Act there was no corresponding depression in Ireland. He agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dublin University that if that argument was to be maintained the operations of the Land Commission in Ireland were more doubly damned than he believed them to be. Every day they were assenting parties to the reduction of agricultural rents in Ireland, on the ground that the value of land had declined, and that agricultural depression in the United Kingdom had spread over Ireland. That was the only basis on which the so-called Judges could honourably lower rents in Ireland. To ask him to believe that agricultural depression, which had done so much damage in England and Scotland, was an unknown factor in Ireland was asking him to believe more than his conscience would permit him to do. Granting that there was ground for differentiation, what had that to do with it? The hon. and learned Member for Stroud tried to convince them that Griffiths' valuation had a varying standard in different parts of Ireland, and was lower in the south than in the north, and the standard of rating and valuation was different in Ireland from England. But what on earth this had to do with the question whether the Agricultural Rating Act should be applied to Ireland he could not understand. It had been said that we ought always to follow the principle of distribution which had commended itself to the House—a division according to fixed proportions—and when we had a certain amount set aside from the revenue of the country for the local purposes of the United Kingdom they ought to allot that amount according to agreed proportions. There might be good reason for that course in certain circumstances, but those circumstances had not arisen in this case. They had a certain definite principle laid down for the relief of a distressed industry, and the whole object of the Agricultural Rating Bill was the relief of a definite specified industry. Why in the world should that principle be scattered to the winds as far as Ireland was concerned? Differentiation was made on a totally different ground. In Scotland it was found that allocation on the principle of arithmetical proportion did not involve a large expenditure on the part of the Exchequer, but that in Ireland it would. It was said that the expenditure was too large, and that they ought not to incur it. Why, it was on the ground that agriculture was the largest and most important industry in England that Parliament was asked to give it assistance. But if that was true of England, was it not infinitely more so of Ireland? ["Hear, hear!"] It was the largest and, indeed, with a few exceptions, the only industry of Ireland; and surely it was common sense to say that if the largest industry in England, being agriculture, was to be benefited in this way, it was equally fair to grant the same relief to that industry which was far the largest in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He was unable to see on what logical grounds the Chancellor of the Exchequer could support his opposition to the motion of the hon. Member for Derry City. For the first time since the Union there was absolute unanimity on the part of the representatives of Irish constituencies, and, while in other matters he differed very largely from them, on this question he was no whit behind his colleagues in the representation of Belfast or from Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] He had been for six or seven years trying to convince his constituents that the only salvation for them politically was by adhering to the principle of equal treatment for all parts of the United Kingdom. He had been recently endeavouring to enforce the view of the Government with regard to the financial relations question, and to convince his constituents that England, Ireland and Scotland were not to be regarded as separate entities in financial treatment. He should be adopting an attitude not only in conflict with that, but should also be taking up a position which was absolutely contemptible and ridiculous from his own point of view, if he were now to go to Belfast and try to unteach his constituents everything he had been striving to teach them, and, in a case where there was a slight pecuniary advantage to the Exchequer, induce them to reverse the judgment he had asked them to form and regard as false the opinions he had formerly expounded to them. [Cheers.] Unless stronger reasons were given to the House for rejecting this Motion than had been advanced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, hon. Members from Ireland would be justified in saying they had not been met fairly in this matter, and there would be what he had always urged was one of the greatest dangers that could possibly overtake the Unionist Party and the country at large—a real, unredressed grievance which had been temperately stated in the House of Commons, and which had not received proper attention from a Unionist Government. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) observed that it seemed to him that the real issue was not so much whether Ireland would get an advantage out of this, or whether England would; but the real question was on what basis had they at the last five elections acted concerning the legislation between Great Britain and Ireland? It had been his lot to be a candidate in the elections of 1880, 1885, 1886, 1892, and 1895, and at every one of these elections, especially in the heated times of 1880, 1885, and 1886, he pledged himself, in opposing all idea of Home Rule, that they should go in for a systematic arrangement, by which the legislation of the two islands should be, as far as possible, practically the same. No doubt it was true that there were great differences in the position of the land in Ireland and the land in England. But since the year 1885, and especially in the present Parliament, it seemed to him they had been doing their utmost to increase rather than reduce those differences, and he asked himself, in considering a matter such as this, why could they not continue on the principles which they so emphatically laid down in the elections to which he referred? In 1886 Lord Randolph Churchill, who was certainly one of the leading members of the Unionist Party, spoke continually all over the country, and he had a good deal to do with him on many occasions, for, the Conservative Party not being then so flourishing as now, the services of many people were gladly received. Speaking as Leader of the House concerning various questions connected with local government and other matters in Ireland, Lord Randolph Churchill said:—

> "The signposts of our policy were at that time (January 1886), and are still, equality and similarity, and, if I may use such a word, simultaneity of treatment so far as practicable."

He regarded the statement that was then made as the key-note of their policy, namely, the doing away with differences; and whether it cut against their financial interest or tended in the other direction, he considered they should adopt the principle that in all these Measures they should have one law for both countries. In this particular case it was possible that the Irish Members had somewhat exaggerated the circumstances, and the amount they might get if there was an alteration. But, whether that was so or not, it seemed to him that they did not do away with the feeling of discontent, and they could not meet their constituents fairly if they passed a law giving a large amount to the agricultural interest in England, and denied it to the same interest in Ireland. He himself was not enamoured with the Act passed last year. He should have much preferred to have taken the subject of local taxation as a whole and dealt with it properly while they were about it. But it was passed on the very plausible and reasonable idea that English agriculture was in a very depressed state. But the last Land Bill they passed for Ireland was based on the idea that Irish agriculture was worse than the English, and on that ground they consented to do what many of them thought was an unfair act to those Irish landlords who had always been loyal to the Union for generations past, and from whom a large slice of their property was taken simply because agriculture in Ireland was then said to be even more depressed than it was in England. They could not blow hot and cold, they must do one thing or the other; and if it was true that the condition of Irish agriculture justified the passing of the Act of last year in connection with land, all he had to say was that that cut away the ground from the Government asserting that they ought not to give the same measure of justice to Ireland which they gave to England last year. Ever since he had been in the House he had endeavoured to be uniform and consistent in his policy, and for that reason he should vote for the Resolution, believing that the right principle must be that similar laws and similar justice must be meted out to Ireland as to England if they were to maintain the Union, as he sincerely trusted they should.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) commented on the unity which prevailed among all the Irish representatives on this question, remarking that the position taken up by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was becoming more and more untenable as speech succeeded speech. He was considerably surprised that the hon. and learned Member for Stroud should have invited them to leave the agricultural aspect of this question out of sight altogether. But it was utterly impossible to approach the consideration of the question as far as Ireland was concerned without taking the agricultural aspect of the case into account. The cardinal point of the case was that they had but one main industry in Ireland, and that was agriculture, and there could be no proper appreciation of the question if this was left out of consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to a union, that of Belmullet, with the conditions of which he was personally very well acquainted. The right hon. Gentleman charged the high rating of that union with having been brought about by mismanagement on the part of the Guardians. He was present in that House during the Debate when the hon. Member for North Mayo—in which constituency this union was situated—brought forward the most alarming and distressed conditions of the people of that union, and he was surprised to hear the Chief Secretary get up on that occasion and tell them that the remedy for the state of things that existed in the union was to provide for the large number of outdoor and indoor relief cases out of the rates of the union. Did the right hon. Gentleman know what the rates of the union were? It would scarcely be believed that that union, covering an area of 130 square miles, was only valued at something like £10,000, and that the poor rate went so high as 10s. in the pound. He could compare the argument of the Chief Secretary to nothing so much as to feeding a dog off its own tail, and in this case there was very little of the tail left. The argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the conditions of taxation in Ireland were different to those in England, and that they had no land tax and no school tax to pay, did not tally with the Report of the Financial Relations Commission. Considerable stress had been laid on the question as to the method in which relief should be given. He was not particularly enamoured with some of the systems under which taxation was managed. For instance, he thought they required a very radical change as regarded the system of grand jury management. With regard to the administration of the poor law, he could say that, when the ordinary Irish Poor Law Guardian went into the board room and had to take charge of his own money and see how it was laid out, there was no harder individual to be found and none who was less generous, he was sorry to say, in many cases, to the poor. The charge of extravagance and mismanagement against the Poor Law Guardians of the money entrusted to them utterly broke down. As regarded the county cess, while he disapproved strongly of the system under which the county cess was collected and distributed, nevertheless there was this consolation about it, that it was collected and distributed in Ireland. It did not find its way into other channels; and they were, of course, hopeful that at some future date there would be some change in the system. The case that presented itself to their minds was, that while the Government had taken pains to relieve the pressing wants of the agricultural population in England by giving them half the rates, in Ireland, with its declining and poorer population, there was no effort made to relieve the condition of the people or to stanch any of the wounds from which they suffered as a result of their grievances. He thought there never was a more unanswerable case made out from both sides of the House than had been made out in that Debate, and he should not be greatly surprised—indeed he should hopefully look forward to it—if the Government were defeated unless they put before the House a better case than they had up to the present time.

*Mr. LECKY (Dublin University), who was received with Nationalist cheers, said it semed to him that the real arguments on which this whole controversy turned, and on which they should vote, might be compressed into very few words. Last year they passed a Measure paying half the local taxes of the agricultural part of England. They excluded from the operation of the Act the portion of the Empire which was the poorest, which was the most purely agricultural, and in which local rates were the most heavy, both absolutely and in proportion to the population. [Nationalist cheers.] The Government put them off by apportioning to them a sum which was somewhere about £600,000 less than they should have had if they had been treated on the same footing as England. [Nationalist cheers.] They did this at a time when a Commission, including some of the very best financial experts that England possessed, had been pronouncing that the taxable capacity of Ireland was certainly not more than 1-20th part of the taxable capacity of the Empire, while the taxation of Ireland was about 1-11th or 1-12th part. That was the case they put forward, and what were the arguments which had been given in answer to it? In the first place, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had apparently denied the existence of agricultural depression in Ireland. If that were true the Government must be strangely misled which allowed a tribunal to go on in Ireland reducing Irish rents at the rate of somewhere about 60 per cent. [Nationalist cheers.] If it were true that these immense reductions had taken place without any real agricultural depression, he could only say that the robbery which had been going on under the form of a judicial Land Court was far greater than even he, who held no very undecided views about the propriety or the honesty of their Land Act, would venture to assert. [Nationalist cheers.] It was quite true that pasture land was, on the whole, less depreciated than wheat land, but at the same time the depreciation was undoubted and real. ["Hear, hear!"] A considerable portion of Irish agriculture was of just the same kind as that of England, and if, over the rest of the country, the depression was less intense than in England, it extended over a far wider area and had a far greater influence upon the well being of the country. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that relief to Ireland ought to be proportionate, not to the agricultural area of the country, not to the distress of the country, but to the sums which Ireland paid to Imperial taxation. He could only repeat what was said by his right hon. Friend and learned colleague—was this a principle which they would ever dream of applying to Wiltshire or Norfolk? Why, then, should they apply it to Mayo and Connemara? [Nationalist cheers.] Then it was said that the conditions of Ireland were such that they could not apply precisely the same Measures to Ireland that they could apply to England. It was perfectly true that in many ways there were immense differences between England and Ireland, but he would appeal to the candour of English Members whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given one single reason why the process of paying half the agricultural rates of Ireland was different from paying half the agricultural rates of England. [Nationalist cheers.] Perhaps some hon. Members disagreed. If they did so, at all events the Irish case was invincible for asking, if not for a precisely similar remedy, for an equivalent one. ["Hear, hear!"] Could they say that they were treated in an equivalent manner when they were put off with about £600,000 a year less than was paid to England? But it did not seem to him really to signify at all whether they accepted the view which was generally adopted by English Members, who said that Ireland ought to be treated simply as a portion of England, and ought not to be treated as a separate entity, or whether they adopted the view that Ireland was a separate entity, entitled by the Act of Union and the Consolidating Act of 1816, and by all the precedents of Irish legislation, to separate treatment. Take the first of these alternatives. If there was no distinction between the two countries, what was Ireland but a group of counties rather poorer and rather more purely agricultural than the poorest and most agricultural parts of England? Take the other alternative. They then found that, according to the verdict of this Commission, on which so many distinguished English authorities sat, Ireland was already taxed much in excess of her proportionate resources, and was, therefore, pre-eminently entitled to some relief from the Exchequer. He knew the conclusions of this Commission were repudiated—[Nationalist cheers]—by the Government. They were going to form another Commission—[Irish laughter]—to inquire into certain points which he did not say might not be very properly investigated by a Commission, but he did say that the reference to this new Commission was so deceptive that it would carry no weight in the country. [Nationalist cheers.] It absolutely omitted from the determining influences, in deciding what was the proper proportion of taxation between the two countries, their comparative wealth and the comparative degrees of their progress. At all events, whatever might come from the second Commission, up to the present moment the verdict was in their favour —[Nationalist cheers]—and it only strengthened, instead of weakened, their claim to be treated in this matter of rating exactly in the same manner as the other portions of the Empire. [Nationalist cheers.] The Government were at present practically omnipotent. Never in our generation had there been a Government so powerful; never, he supposed, in any generation had an English Government commanded such unlimited resources. [Opposition cheers.] If the Government acted shabbily in this matter to Ireland, and availed themselves of this opportunity to try and diminish that to which the Irish people were justly entitled, could they be surprised that such action should produce among their followers discontent and disgust? [Opposition cheers.] Ireland was now perfectly quiet; agitation had gone down and had become discredited; the whole country was looking up to this great, omnipotent Unionist Government to act fairly towards Ireland. But no one who knew anything of Ireland could fail to see that there was spreading through all classes and all sections of opinion a belief that this great Government was not going to treat Ireland in money matters fairly and honourably. [Nationalist cheers.] He could hardly imagine any conviction more ominous for the future of Ireland, and it filled him personally with alarm. [Cheers.] Of all times this was the time when just and even liberal Measures ought to be carried for Ireland, and this was the Government to take the work in hand. They ought to be carried, even though the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his next Budget was not able to boast that he had paid off quite so much as 7½ millions of the National Debt. [Nationalist cheers.] He confessed that what was taking place that evening reminded him painfully of a passage in one of the great speeches of Speaker Forster against the Union. One of his predictions was that the time might come when the whole body of Irish representatives might say that the system of taxation in Ireland was unfair, and when the whole body of Irish representatives would be overridden and defeated by an English and Scottish majority. [Nationalist cheers.]

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) also submitted that the words of Speaker Forster in 1800 were perfectly applicable to the present Debate. The time, however, had now come when a Chancellor of the Exchequer, with all the authority of the Government behind him, said, in effect, that he in money matters despised the united voice of a united Ireland. Not a Member from Ireland had defended the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because they would not and dared not do so. Where was the Secretary to the Admiralty? Where was the Irish Solicitor General? The hon. and learned Member would never get returned again for the St. Stephen's Green Division, nor would his successor—[laughter]—he meant his successor in the same Unionist policy. The game of the Unionists in Ireland was up, and all Irishmen at the present moment were united against the Government in order to obtain just benefits for their own country. He maintained that the policy of the Government was contrary to the Sixth Article of the Act of Union, and that for one reason or another their policy had been a tissue of barbarity, fraud, and robbery.

Captain PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said that the question appeared to him to be this. A certain grant had been made on the Report of a Royal Commission, which, rightly or wrongly, dealt only with the grievances of the English farmer. On that Report the majority of the House decided that it would be to the advantage of England that a contribution should be made to the impoverished local ratepayer in England from the Imperial taxation contributed by Englishmen as apart from Scotchmen and Irishmen. [" No, no! "]

This grant was occasioned by the necessities of England alone. There were two distinct questions of taxation—Imperial and local. Imperial taxation was governed by the Act of Union—that the most impartial treatment should be meted out to every individual taxpayer or recipient of money from the taxes. But in the question of local taxation, wherein the three countries had been separated, each country had to find its own contribution for its own purposes. When England decided that it would be to her advantage to make a grant from the Imperial taxes contributed by Englishmen to the local taxation, this could only be taken from the bulk which was contributed by the three countries alike. But, in order to arrive at the sum to be paid to the English local taxpayer, a sum was taken in excess of what was paid by the English local taxpayer and in excess of the needs of the English farmer alone, and the excess represented, not the necessity of the Scotch or Irish farmer, but the contribution of the Scotch and Irish peoples to the Imperial Exchequer. That excess had been returned to Scotland and Ireland rather, if anything, in excess of the amount of their individual contribution. The money which had been paid to the English farmer came solely out of the English Imperial taxpayer's pocket, and not a farthing had come out of the pocket of the Scottish or Irish taxpayer. Now the Irish representatives asked that the assistance to the Irish local ratepayer should not, as in England, be taken from the contribution of the Irish to the Imperial Exchequer. They ignored the contribution of the Irish Imperial taxpayer, and, while basing their claim for relief on the necessities of the Irish farmer, they did not take that relief from the Irish contribution only. If the Irish Members could prove that one penny of Irish money had been taken for the benefit of the English farmer, they would have a right to ask that English money should be applied for the benefit of the Irish farmer.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I have heard in the course of my Parliamentary experience a great many Separatist speeches, specially favouring the views of hon. Members below the gangway, but I have never heard a more frank and candid Separatist speech than the one we have just listened to. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member has given the Union away altogether, and has laid down the doctrine of separate financial entity with exceptional force. I am not going to discuss the various points raised in this Debate, which although germane to the Resolution, do not exactly bear upon it. To-night we ought to confine our attention to the Act which we passed last year for the relief of agricultural distress. I must demur to the account which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave of its origin, and especially to his view that the chief element in the agricultural depression was the way in which this country had been affected as a wheat-growing country. The Report of the Royal Commission stated that the severity of the depression varied greatly in different districts, and that from no part of Great Britain could it be said to be altogether absent. That showed that the depression was not confined to wheat-growing counties, and the Commissioners also said that the chief cause of the calamity was the heavy and progressive fall in agricultural prices. The evidence was not confined to cereals, but extended over the whole range of agricultural produce. Well, the Act of last year gave the occupiers of agricultural land in England a present of half their rates, and separate provision was made for Scotland. Now, what were the objects of this grant? The President of the Local Government Board told us that the two objects were relief from excessive taxation and aid to agricultural distress, and the whole argument of the Government was that the grant would relieve the farmer, the landowner, and the labourer—that it would relieve the industry of agriculture as a whole. My first point is that Ireland also needs relief from excessive taxation and aid to agricultural distress. The Chancellor of the Exchequer contests that. He denies that local taxation in Ireland is any higher than in England, but we can only take the figures. The hon. Member for Thirsk, I know, told the House that there had been a heavy increase in the rates in England and a very small increase in Ireland, and he cited some very large figures purporting to show that in the last few years the amount of local taxation in England had advanced by leaps and bounds. But the increase in England was not in agricultural taxation, but in the taxation of the Metropolis, and in the taxation of the large towns, and the increase in rural taxation has been a mere bagatelle. If the right hon. Gentleman would refer to the Report of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the present First Lord of the Admiralty, and to my supplement of it, bringing it up to date, he would see that during the last 50 years there has been a decrease in agricultural rates. The increase has been in the education rate, and that has been very partial in its operation. I have always put the amount of rural taxation in this country at 2s. 4d. in the pound, including the education rate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech informed us that the Estimates of the Local Government Board were considerably in excess of what the real amount turned out to be, and I think he said the amount required now for the relief of rates in England and Wales was £1,330,000. The President of the Local Government Board told us to-night that the value of agricultural land in England was 24½ millions, so that you will see that the agricultural rate is not 2s. 4d. It is not 2s. 2d., not 2s. 1d. It is rather under that figure. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derry put the Irish rate at 3s. 3d., and I think he put it too low. ["Hear, hear!"] We have no complete figures with reference to Ireland, but taking the amount of taxation as a whole, it is very heavy; but at all events, whether you put it at 3s. 6d., or 3s., or 2s. 6d., you cannot contend that there is any distinction. If in the one case the rate is a pressure on agriculture in England, the same rate must be a pressure on agriculture in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Whatever theory you may hold on the financial relations of the two countries, nobody can get up and say Ireland is a lightly-taxed country. Having regard to the poverty of Ireland, having regard to the fact that it does not possess any minerals, and that it relies in the main on its agricultural produce and trade, the pressure on Ireland is very considerable. That being so, there being this local taxation, which is a great pressure on the one country and is an equal or greater pressure on the other country, then comes the question as to whether there is agricultural distress. The Chancellor of the Exchequer disputed the existence of distress, but no Irish Member disputes it—["hear, hear!"]—and the Government is not without its supporters from Ireland. It has, in fact, a very staunch band of supporters from that country, and not one of them has got up and supported the Chancellor of the Exchequer. ["Hear, hear!"] There was one English Member who discovered that there was great discrepancy between the modes of valuation adopted in England and in Ireland, but that was irrelevant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has evidently not read the evidence given before the Financial Relations Commission. The evidence given by all the witnesses from Ireland—not partisan witnesses, but independent witnesses—proved that there has been an enormous decrease in the value of agricultural produce in Ireland, and an hon. Friend of mine behind me gave conclusive personal evidence of the existence of distress in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] But there is one thing that must come home to English Members. If agriculture in Ireland is not depressed, what was the raison d'être of the Land Act of last year? ["Hear, hear!"] It was that there was a crisis in Ireland, owing to the fall in the price of produce, and that the tenants could not pay their rents. There is a deep-rooted opinion in the minds of authorities in Ireland, and certainly among the tenant farmers, that agricultural depression exists, or they would not ask for, and they certainly ought not to receive, the enormous reductions in rent that are now being made. ["Hear, hear!"] There could be no sounder test as to the fall in prices. I am, therefore, obliged to reject the contention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there is not in Ireland, as there is in England and Scotland, that general fall, in some articles greater, in some articles less, which has produced a different rate of agricultural depression. So far as this country is concerned, there is not the same depression in Devonshire as there is in Essex, but there is a widespread depression over the whole Kingdom, and there is a widespread depression over Ireland. Here was a calamity; the phrase used in the gracious Speech from the Throne was, I believe, "grievous disaster." I cannot think anyone can maintain that in the midst of that agricultural depression which has spread over the greater part of Europe, and which England and Scotland have both suffered from, Ireland alone is a sort of oasis in the desert. [Nationalist cheers.] Where did the money come from out of which that grant was made? [Cheers.] It came from the Imperial Exchequer of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It came from the taxes to which every subject of the Queen in England, Scotland and Ireland contributes his full share. Out of the taxation of the United Kingdom 1¾ millions was appropriated for the purpose of the relief of a national calamity—that calamity being the depressed state of agriculture in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Scotland has had her share, England has had her share, and the object of this Motion is that Ireland also should have her share. [Cheers.] But, says the hon. Member opposite, you must measure her share by her proportionate contribution to the Imperial Exchequer. Every penny that Scotland has got Scotland has paid. Why stop there? Why do not you go to the counties? Has Lincolnshire paid as much to the National Exchequer as Lancashire? I think Essex will have a great deal more than Middlesex. Is the contribution to Essex to be in proportion to her contribution to the Imperial Exchequer? No; the ground is a united nation paying into a common fund and all being treated alike. The Government would not even listen to anything else. We did not say, you must give more to Lancashire and less to Essex because Lancashire contributes so largely to Imperial funds. No; we said, you must give more to Essex and less to Lancashire, because the need is so much greater. The Government said, we can draw no such distinction; all must be treated alike; and, although in Lancashire they are getting £2 an acre, and in Essex not 10s. an acre, and although for market gardens round London they are getting £10 an acre rent where others are getting £1, you must all be treated alike. The one burden is upon all in the rates; all must have precisely the same share in the fund which is being devoted to relief of rates. Well, but that is the Irish case. [Nationalist cheers.] You ought to deal with Ireland upon your own principles—Unionist principles. You cannot sever Ireland from Middlesex or Lancashire. Then the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, but this relief is not given to individuals, to a class, to an industry. That is exactly where I join issue with him. It is given to an industry—to the agricultural industry. You use the word manufacture as different from agriculture. Agriculture is as much a manufacture as either cotton or iron. The agriculturist manfactures commodities—beef and bread, mutton and butter. Ireland is a great manufacturing country in that respect. It competes in the same market with this country. The farmer's case in England is this—you are not rating me as a professional man or an ordinary tradesman; you are rating me upon my whole capital and the means by which that capital is employed; you are putting me at a disadvantage with every foreign competitor. You relieve the English agriculturist, and you do not relieve the Irish. [Nationalist cheers.] That is a bounty, the Chancellor of the Exchequer notwithstanding. It is a bounty to the English agricultural interest as compared with the Irish. The English agricultural interest and the Irish both meet in the market of Bristol, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer represents, to sell their butter. One comes there with an impost upon his butter, and the other with the same impost reduced by one-half out of the Imperial Exchequer. [Nationalist cheers.] I should like to appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite. The symbol of their faith and the watchword of their Party have been complete union, complete equality, identity of treatment as between the two countries. The hon. Member for Islington has quoted his own election pledges, and he quoted a still higher authority—namely, that of the late Lord Randolph Churchill in a memorable passage. But he did not recall to the House the fact that two or three years afterwards the noble Lord repeated that declaration, and he gave us at that time an interesting piece of information. That statement was not only submitted to the Cabinet, it was submitted to the leaders of the Unionist Party, three of whom are now Members of the Government and one of whom is sitting opposite. They expressed their full approval of that statement—["hear, hear!"]—as having been made on behalf of the Unionist Party in the House of Commons. ["Hear, hear!"] And that statement has not been fulfilled by one jot or one tittle. [Cheers.] Killing Home Rule with kindness! Is that the way in which it is being killed? And you have hon. Members on the other side of the House whose political career and status are bound up with their indomitable opposition to Home Rule, which they denounced as unjust, denouncing the action of the Government in this matter of treating Ireland! Well, now, I put it to you as Unionists, how you can justify as fair treatment for Ireland what you could not resist if the demand came from Yorkshire, Somerset, or Cornwall. [Cheers.] I have heard some remarks made about the justice of the House of Commons. I was sorry to hear it said that the House would not act justly. I believe that the House, though it might be temporarily misled—["hear, hear!"]—would not, whatever Party was in power, give an unfair decision on the whole. I believe in the justice of the House of Commons. I believe hon. Members will endeavour to do justice in this matter. I put one point to you of a very exceptional nature. The oldest man in this House cannot remember an instance where all the representatives of Ireland—except those who are Members of the Government—[laughter]—have been united. [Cheers.] Now, just take the speeches. There were the two Members for Dublin University, there was the Member for Belfast, there was the Member for the County of Dublin—all representative men, all Unionist Members. I do not know whether the Member for Armagh will speak, but I believe he is in sympathy with those of his Friends who have addressed the House. [Colonel Saunderson: "Hear, hear!"] Can we shut our eyes, I will not say merely as Members of the House, but as men of common sense, to this significant, this unparalleled, this unprecedented occurrence as to a question which has arisen between the two countries in which the poor country is all on one side, and a majority, I fear, of the richer country on the other? Is this wise? Whether you be Unionists or not, whether you believe this claim to be just or unjust, is it not wise to have regard to the significant attitude of the people of Ireland as a people speaking through their representatives? Is it wise to pay no heed to the speeches of the Members for the University, who have no need to court popular applause? If Irish Members can be independent, they can be independent. After their significant speeches I put it to the House—I wish I could put it to the Government—is it wise to adopt a non possumus attitude, always remembering this, there is no want of money? [Irish cheers.] The money is there; there is no question about that. It is a question whether you will do justice to the weaker and poorer country, whether you will treat it as you have done the richer; and in the interests of the Union, the true Union, which I for one believe in and as ardently desire as any man opposite—in the interests of true union and having regard to the reputation for good faith of the people of Great Britain—I ask why we are to treat Ireland differently from the way in which we have treated England? [Cheers.]

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down was perfectly right in one thing he said—that it is not from any want of money that Her Majesty's Government oppose this Motion. It was put somewhat offensively earlier in the Debate that it was from a kind of meanness—[loud Irish cheers]—it was being refused. [Renewed demonstrations on the Irish Benches.] I am quite sure my hon. Friends from Ireland, whatever they may think on this Motion, will not credit the suggestion that we are influenced by motives of that kind.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: No cheers now. [Laughter and Irish cheers.]

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: Whether there are cheers or not, my hon. Friends will not think that of us—[Ministerial cheers]—that it is any want of generosity to Ireland that makes us take this step. [Some Ministerial cheers and Irish laughter.] I think this is too serious a matter for laughter. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said this is not a party question. We do not treat it as a party question. We have had a very interesting Debate, because it has been a Debate in which an entirely new subject has been discussed, and that is the incidence of Irish rates. One would have thought if there was this Irish grievance we should have heard before now of the intolerable burden on land as regards rates; but during the 25 years in which I have heard Debates upon the incidence of rates as a grievance of English ratepayers, I never heard the subject of Irish rates raised in any serious manner. [Loud cries of "Oh, oh!"] I maintain that the Irish grievance as regards rates has not been before this House in the same manner as English rates. That is absolutely true, and there are good reasons for it. There was first the topic of reducing rents. Then there are many holdings in Ireland so very small that the incidence of rates comes very light indeed. Under £4 the landlord pays the rate. [Cries of "No, no! not the cess!"] I did not say the cess. I said the poor rates.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): The right hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. Under £4 the owner pays the whole of the rates.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: I am perfectly right. Under £4 the landlord pays the whole of the rates; and above £4 the landlord pays half and the occupier pays half. That is not so in England; and the difference accounts for the undoubted fact that there has not been in Ireland the same rating grievance as in England. [Nationalist cries of "Oh!"] I particularly call the attention of the House to this fact—that among all the proposals made in the Financial Relations Commission for the redress of the alleged inequality of treatment between England and Ireland the relief of Irish rates had no place. ["Hear, hear!"]. If this grievance is so great, is not that a singular fact? The question is only raised now, after relief has been given to the English ratepayers. [Cheers.] I do not wish to say that it is not a genuine grievance, but I do say that, as far as the House of Commons is concerned, it is a comparatively new grievance. ["No!" from Mr. T. M. HEALY.] My experience of the House is even longer than that of the hon. and learned Member, and I have followed the question of rating closely. I say that such Motions as we have repeatedly had declaring that the burden of the rates in England is intolerable, we have not had with respect to Ireland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: There was one as far back as 1881, and the question was raised long before then. [Nationalist cheers.]

First Lord of the Admiralty

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: The question may have been raised incidentally, but not in the same way as the English rating question. But hon. Members have still to account for the fact that the Financial Relations Commission gave no guidance to the Government with regard to rating; and, supposing that we had accepted all the recommendations of that Commission and given effect to them, nothing would have been done for the rates. ["Hear, hear!"] All this which is now demanded from us, as if it were a scandal that it should not be conceded, was never considered by the representatives of Ireland who sat on the Financial Relations Commission. [Cheers.] I will go back to 1888, when the question of the equivalent grant first came to be considered. One question is whether Ireland ought to have money; and the other is, if she ought to have more money, in what direction that money ought to be given. The hon. and learned Member, in introducing this Resolution, spoke of the origin of the equivalent grant as if it had been conceived in a spirit hostile to Ireland. [Nationalist cheers.] That is entirely unhistorical. What was the origin of it? We were handing over to the relief of English taxation a portion of the Death Duties, and at that time no demand was made from Ireland in regard to relief of rates.

SIR H. FOWLER: County Councils had not then been established in Ireland as in England.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: I am explaining the position historically; I am not arguing. But County Councils had not been established in Ireland, says the right hon. Gentleman. [Nationalist cheers.] Well, if you have not the same local authorities, it is a question whether you can make the same rating arrangements. [Ironical Nationalist cheers and interruption.] Hon. Members opposite have been listened to with attention, and I must ask for the same indulgence. [Cheers.] These financial matters require careful treatment. This equivalent grant was originally conceived in order to save Ireland and Scotland from a disadvantage under which they would otherwise have lain. From that time certain proportions have been set aside as the contribution to England, Scotland, and Ireland. The ratio of those contributions has proved, on the whole, to be singularly fair, and has not been shaken in any degree by the examination of the Financial Relations Commission. From that time forth Ireland and Scotland have always been indemnified when any particular relief has been given to England. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton says that is a Separatist doctrine. If it is, I am responsible for it. [Cheers.] If that was a Separatist doctrine it was conceived in the interest of Ireland itself. We thought that what Ireland received should be put on precisely the same footing; but now it is that this is a Separatist action to resist this Motion. It would be true if we were starting afresh, if there were no separate legislation as regards poor law, education, and payment of the police. ["Hear, hear!"] We are to be called Separatists because, having given Ireland separate treatment to her advantage, we follow the same principle upon this occasion. It cannot be denied that there are separate arrangements in Ireland to those in England. Ireland pays no school rate at all; but the hon. Gentleman opposite said it is not enough to state the case in this way—the Irish ratepayer has not been relieved, and the English ratepayer has been relieved. I ask, is it not monstrously unjust that an inmate of Bethnal Green should have to pay a school rate out of his poor earnings, while in Ireland the school rate is paid from the Imperial funds? [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I am arguing about principles.

MR. KNOX: I am talking about money.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: I hope the hon. Gentleman thinks there is some connection between principles and money. [Laughter.] The real difference between us and our Irish friends and opponents, who are both against us on this occasion, is that they refuse the doctrine of set-off. [Cries of "No!"] Well, if you accept the doctrine of set-off, Ireland owes England at this moment a million. [Ironical laughter, and A VOICE: "Good old England!"] The whole matter lies in a nutshell. If you do not accept the doctrine of set-off, Ireland is overtaxed; if you accept the doctrine of set-off, Ireland is not overtaxed.

MR. LOUGH: That is not the finding of the Royal Commission.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: No; because the Royal Commission would not accept the doctrine of set-off, and did not go into the question; and that is why it is necessary to have another Commission. [Ironical laughter.] It is very well to have one side of the account examined and reported upon, and to accept the conclusions of the Commission, without the expenditure side—the side where Ireland receives more money in proportion than either of the two other parts of the United Kingdom—being accepted. That is the issue upon the present occasion. If you consider that that which is given locally is to be taken into account, Ireland is not paying too much. I wonder to what extent hon. Members from Ireland are satisfied with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. They cheered that speech spasmodically—occasionally tentatively, if I may say so. ["Hear, hear!"] Their shrewd instincts may have told them the right hon. Gentleman was shattering the whole basis of the Financial Relations Commission. ["Hear, hear!"] I wonder whether they are prepared to take the right hon. Gentleman as their leader and their organ upon this matter. The right hon. Gentleman has not the slightest sympathy with hon. Members in claiming any reduction for Ireland as a whole. He evidently thinks that every taxpayer in Ireland ought to pay precisely the same as every taxpayer in England, and with those Unionist sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman I thoroughly agree. I welcome his sentiments as showing that the proper principle is to treat every county in England and Ireland upon the same footing.

SIR H. FOWLER: I said that was your principle.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: That was the basis of the right hon. Gentleman's argument. The right hon. Gentleman was so eloquent upon it that I thought he was expressing his own sentiments; and what is more, I believe he was. [Cheers.] Now, in putting forward isolated cases and asking the House to come to certain conclusions upon them I think he was more oratorical than logical. An hon. Member behind me put the case in this way: If we can prove there are a few cases where the rates in Ireland are 10s., whereas in Essex not more than 6s. is paid, the whole question is settled. We cannot treat the question upon any given special and exceptional cases, but the matter must be regarded as a whole. Let me ask the House to consider a further difference in the situation between England and Ireland. What was the system which both parties followed before the time when the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends introduced Home Rule? It was that it was not considered Separatist that Ireland should be exempt from certain taxation. Is it not natural, if the rating systems are different in the two countries, that the Government should hesitate before applying the same rules to both? I quite admit that it is a perfectly fair argument to say, if it should be proved that these two systems are sufficiently alike to admit of equality of treatment, then the question of the relief of the Irish ratepayer ought to be considered. But what we have first to do is to consider whether the two systems are alike. I maintain that they are not. We went pretty far in England when we allowed the State to pay one-half of the poor rate, which is administered by a popularly-elected local body. If in Ireland we were to give relief to the extent of one-half of the rates, you would come to this, that the State would pay one-half of the poor rate, the landlord would pay a quarter, and the occupier, in whose hands the entire power of the expenditure of these rates would be—[cries of "No, no," and "Ex officio Guardians"]—would only pay one quarter of the rates. [Cheers.] The time may come when different arrangements will be made in Ireland with regard to local authorities, and I say again, we would not wish to shut the door upon the question of rates as regards Ireland. The fact of the matter is that it is already being inquired into by a Royal Commission. The late Royal Commission recommended, as has been pointed out before, that relief should be given to British agriculture in the sense of the relief of the rates, and it was done. The Financial Relations Commission did not recommend that—

An hon. Member: It was not referred to them.

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: Nor was it referred to them to say in what sense taxation should be reduced; nor as to what special recommendations they should make with regard to the spending of money which belonged to Ireland. The whole field was open to them, and the one idea that never struck any single member of the Commission was that it should go in relief of rates. [Cheers.]

Mr. G. W. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): As a member of the Commission, I desire to say that it was appointed to inquire into Imperial taxation, and not into local rates. ["Hear, hear!"]

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: If, instead of recommending a remission of the spirit and tobacco duties, they had recommended that the money should be applied in the relief of rates, it would doubtless have been a very wise provision; and I am not at all sure, if the Royal Commission should report that Ireland pays too much, this would not be as good a form of applying the money as many of the others of which we hear. I have read a good deal on the subject in the Press, and have seen a good many proposals, but the question of the money being applied in the relief of rates was taken up within very narrow limits. I hope hon. Members from Ireland will understand the spirit in which I make this remark. I do not at all say that, if it should be proved that under a general system of taxation Ireland is overtaxed, this Motion does not show the best method of applying a remedy. But then, what has got to be proved is that Ireland is paying too much; and there I must come back to the point which I know my hon. Friends from Ireland do not like—namely, the question of the set-off.

Colonel WARING: On this side of the House Irish Members agree on that question.

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY: If that question of the set-off is considered, then Ireland is not being unduly taxed. Let me deal once more with the question of our being treated as Separatists if we do not on this occasion follow the principle of equal treatment. In considering that point every item—education, police, and others—must be looked upon; and you cannot fairly single out a certain item, such as rates, and say: "If you do not deal with that in a certain way you are Separatists." I repeat, with all the force I can command, that our financial arrangements as between the two countries are not influenced by a desire to assist our own constituencies at the expense of our Irish friends. ["Hear, hear!"] That is a charge that cannot be brought against this Government. I do not think it is a charge that can be brought against the previous Government. Except in the case of the Home Rule Bill—and there would be no money whatever left under that Bill for the relief of Irish rates—["Hear, hear!" and laughter]—except in that particular both sides of the House have been anxious to deal with Ireland in a fair and generous spirit. [Cheers.]

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said the right hon. Gentleman had commenced his speech by repudiating the suggestion that the present Government was actuated by any desire not to deal fairly with Ireland in this matter. He never heard that statement made in the House at any time without doubting it. His experience was that not only was the charge just as regarded the present Government, but as regarded every Government. The right hon. Gentleman began by saying this was a new grievance. It was a very old one. The grievance was before him now, and the question was, what answer was he going to make to it. The right hon. Gentleman gave an interesting account of how these grants are made to Ireland. He (Mr. Clancy) thought as he was listening to him he must have been a Separatist Chancellor of the Exchequer. His account was a curious one, coming from a Unionist Chancellor of the Exchequer. He had said these grants were given in the proportion in which Ireland paid to the Imperial Exchequer. He attempted to explain that this principle was adopted because there were no County Councils in Ireland, and that she had a different system of rating. Whose fault was it that they had not County Councils in Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman had been a Member of a Unionist Government twice during the last six years. His Government had an opportunity, with a majority of 100 at its back, and it failed to establish County Councils. In the present Parliament it had a majority of 150, and no proposals to establish County Councils came from the Government Benches, and never would. The Chancellor of the Exchequer alluded to the difficult system of rating and valuation which existed in Ireland and England. The right hon. Gentleman had heard this argument answered in advance by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton. The answer was that, whether the system in Ireland was different from that in England was nothing to the purpose. The question was whether they had to raise a certain sum of money or not. Having to raise that sum, they in Ireland were entitled to relief in respect to it, and, if so, what did it matter whether they had a different system of rating from England? ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the speech of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton as a Unionist performance. He was not concerned to defend any Member on the Liberal side of the House, but it was within the recollection of the House that the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton argued from the Unionist standpoint. The right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "These are not my principles, they are yours, and I contend that in your present proceedings you are acting, not on your principles, but on ours."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked whether they intended to give up their claim to the three millions if they got the £600,000. As far as he was concerned, he answered frankly he was not going to give up that claim. As soon as he got this £600,000 he would go for the three millions besides. [Cheers.] He was now arguing this on Unionist principles. He took his stand on the Act of Union, and he called on the Unionist Government to apply Unionist principles to Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman did not regard Ireland as a separate entity. In all the discussions that had taken place on the question the Government adopted the same view. Was the right hon. Gentleman going to treat Ireland as a separate entity or not? The sure and simple way to state the Unionist principle in this matter was that Ireland was to be treated as a separate entity when England could make money out of her by that means, and that she was to be treated as a part of the United Kingdom when it suited England's purpose. He regarded argument on this subject absolutely thrown away. The Debate on the subject had been one of the most one-sided he had ever heard in the House. ["Hear, hear!"] The speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been one of the most pitiable he had heard. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had wandered off into irrelevancies, and attacked his predecessors for following the policy which he himself now followed. Everyone knew that both Parties in that country had equally sinned against Ireland in this matter. With all his ability the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not advanced a single argument against the powerful case that had been made out for Ireland. For his part he believed there was no use speaking in the House of Commons on an Irish question until they made it uncomfortable for them in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton was a believer in the justice of the House of Commons. He (Mr. Clancy) did not believe in the justice of the House of Commons, and he did not think that any Irish Member believed in it. The House of Commons of Great Britain was incapable of justice to Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Not a single Measure they had passed for Ireland had been passed through a sense of justice, or because the balance of argument was in its favour. One would imagine that on this occasion, at all events, some sense of English justice might be displayed, because on this occasion they had the representatives of the Unionist Party in Ireland supporting this Motion. He would tell the House frankly what he thought should be done. Arguments and speeches might be of use when this question came within the range of practical politics, and when the Government came down with some practical proposal to do justice to Ireland. What should be done was, by some means or other, to produce something like a rebellion in Ireland against this system of taxation. If they could, by growing tobacco, and failing to pay duty on it, or some means of that kind—the Chancellor of the Exchequer laughed at that idea—if such a plan could be carried out the right hon. Gentleman would not laugh then. ["Hear, hear!"] On the contrary, it would have more effect than any speeches in the House. He counselled his countrymen who could effectively resist the payment of taxation to do so. He regarded with gratitude and respect the recent action of the Grand Jury of Galway, Unionists to a man, who refused to present for certain moneys which had hitherto been paid without demur. If the 31 other Grand Juries in Ireland took a similar course at every Assizes that gave the Government every possible trouble in the collection of taxes. Different speeches from those they had heard would come from the Treasury Bench. Reason and justice were of no account. Action in Ireland would alone be of any use.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said this was a remarkable occasion, the only one he remembered since he had been in the House of Commons, which now extended over a good many years, on which Irish Members of all sections were absolutely united. He left it to any man of candid mind whether any valid argument had been offered against the Motion before the House. They might have thought that the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was supposed to know all about that country—[Nationalist laughter]—would have expressed his views on this Motion. But the First Lord of the Admiralty had spoken instead. The right hon. Gentleman said that what struck him with astonishment was that for many years the question of rating had never been prominently brought forward by Irish Members, and he could not make out why that was. He would tell the right hon. Gentleman. The Irish Members had been so much engaged in reducing rents that they had never thought about rates. [Laughter.] Reducing rents was the most popular subject on which to discourse to an Irish audience, or on which to make an Irish reputation in the House of Commons. Now the Irish people were beginning to see finality in rent. [Laughter.] If Parliament went on steadily reducing rents 30, 40 and 50 per cent. it did not require a far-seeing man to foretell the day when it would not be possible to claim further reduction. The reduction of rates had now assumed in the Irish mind a prominence it had never had before. When the Chief Secretary brought in his Land Bill one of the great reasons he gave for bringing it in was the great fall in agricultural produce in Ireland, and the distress that had ensued.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am not aware that I said that.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON remembered most distinctly his right hon. Friend said in his speech that there had been a great fall in agricultural produce, and, Ireland being an agricultural country, that would naturally produce great distress. That was one of the reasons why the right hon. Gentleman brought in his Bill. But that was a question of reducing rents; and now, when it came to a question of the Irish people asking for something from the British pockets which they helped to fill, the Chancellor of the Exchequer got up and said it was quite a mistake to say there had been any great fall in agricultural produce in Ireland, and that the position of the Irish tenant was infinitely superior to that of the English tenant. He was at a loss to reconcile the state of mind of his two right hon Friends. [Laughter.] All the Irish Members asked for was equal treatment with the rest of the Empire. In the Debates on the financial relations question the argument brought forward by the Treasury Bench was that Ireland could not be treated as a separate entity, yet in opposing this Motion they declared that Ireland was to be treated as a separate entity. ["Hear, hear!"] The object of the House of Commons ought to be to strive to satisfy as far as possible the wishes and fair demands of the Irish people. The First Lord of the Admiralty told them the Government had taken half the rates off the English farmer, but that they refused to do it for the Irish farmer. Why? One of the reasons was because the Government subsidised Ireland in the matter of education, and because they supported the Irish police. He wondered, when the Irish farmer read that, what he would think! Was it wonderful that an Irishman should take a lop-sided view of their policy when he looked at the heifer that he could not sell because he was undersold by the English farmer? His right hon. Friend told the Irishman to keep one eye on the heifer and the other on the nearest policeman, and then feel he was governed by a just Government and Parliament. [Laughter.] The Irishman would not look upon it in that light, and would not be satisfied when he found that, because of the bounty given to the producer in England, he could not sell his butter on equal terms, and would ask to be treated on the same footing as the English farmer. ["Hear, hear!"] No argument had been adduced which ought to cause the House of Commons to decide against the Motion. The rates in Ireland had been clearly shown to be higher than the rates in England; Ireland had been shown to be the poorer country, and the Government having paid half the rates of the agricultural interest in England, with what justice could they refuse to adopt the same course with regard to Ireland? ["Hear, hear!"] He knew the Government were desirous of doing justice to Ireland, and they could not evince this desire better than by devoting some of the surplus money at their disposal in placing Ireland on an equality with the rest of the Empire, which was all that the Irish Members were asking for. He ridiculed the idea that, even if Ireland was dealt with hardly in this matter, it would shake her Unionist principles. Unionism was born in their blood, and they would stick to it to the end. At the same time, and hoping that Unionist principles would ultimately dominate Nationalist and Separatist principles in Ireland, it ought to be the object and effort of statesmen now, in this time of peace, when agitation had sunk out of sight, to prove that, without pressure, without threat, without danger, and without difficulty, they were willing to do open-handed justice to the Irish people. [Cheers.]

*Mr. R. M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.) had no hesitation in saying that the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Admiralty would cause much heartburning among supporters of the Government in Ireland. He believed that they would deplore the present action of the Government, and would look to the future of their country with alarm and despair. If there was one thing more than another that he deplored it was the want of knowledge that he found existing amongst English Members on both sides of the House with regard to Ireland and Irish matters, and, though he firmly believed the finding of the Royal Commission was a just finding in respect to which no new trial should be asked for, still, for the mere purpose of endeavouring to instil knowledge of Ireland among English Members, he would, if he had had the opportunity of explaining his position, have supported the Government in opposing the recent Motion of the hon. Member for Longford. As he did not have that opportunity, his only course was to support that Motion. That want of knowledge was also apparent in the speeches they had heard that night from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Admiralty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer based his opposition to the present Motion principally on the ground that there was no such agricultural depression in Ireland as existed in England. He could only regret that the right hon. Gentleman's knowledge of Ireland fell so far short. If he had consulted the Attorney General for Ireland, who represented a northern agricultural constituency, or the Under Secretary for the Local Government Board, who also represented an agricultural constituency in Ireland, or the Chief Secretary, whose Commissioners in Ireland were reducing judicial rents by, in some instances, as much as 60 per cent., he would not have made the statement that the agricultural depression in Ireland did not require that aid which Irishmen said the local rates ought to get under the Agricultural Rating Bill. He could not but think that the action of the Government in regard to this matter would be connected in Ireland with their recent action in regard to the Financial Relations Commission Report. He could not but feel that it would be considered that, though that Report showed how deeply wronged Ireland had been in the past by Imperial taxation, the Government, with the iron hand of the Treasury at their back, had held back this money, whereas, in all honour, as in all conscience, it ought to have been devoted to the relief of both landlords and tenants in respect of local rates. He trusted that the position pointed out by his kinsman Speaker Foster as possible, so gracefully alluded to by the junior representative of Dublin University, was not about to become an accomplished fact; that Great Britain, having secured the Union, would use her vast majority of votes to refuse justice to the weaker partner. He regretted, as a supporter of the Government, the attitude they had taken up on this occasion, and he hoped that better counsels would prevail among their ranks.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said that Whately once expressed his doubts about the existence of Napoleon Bonaparte, and, having listened to two financial Debates without hearing the voice of the Irish Office, he was inclined to ask, "Have we a Chief Secretary for Ireland?" [Cheers.] Was it not a remarkable fact that, on a question affecting the welfare and the well-being of Ireland, not a Minister connected with Ireland—the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, or the Chief Secretary, or even the Member for South Tyrone—was allowed to open his mouth? He denounced this system. Had they an Irish Government, or had they not? Were they governed by the First Lord of the Admiralty? What had the Navy to do with Ireland? [Laughter.] There was a time when Ireland was represented by statesmen of Cabinet rank in the Irish Office: but in two cardinal Debates affecting Ireland the English Ministers kept their Irish Ministers muzzled. [Laughter.] Who issued the muzzling order to the Irish Office? [Laughter and cheers.] Had the supporters of a Government sat so silent behind a Minister as the great Unionist Party that evening behind the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Admiralty? [Cheers.] So far as cheering went, neither spokesman of the Government had the backing of a single man of their own Party. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and cheers.] It was curious that the officials of the Irish Office, who drew large salaries for looking after Irish affairs, should have remained silent, and that Englishmen concerned with English Departments should alone have been allowed to speak upon this question. And yet the Colonial Secretary once referred to "alien Boards and foreigners!" ["Hear, hear!"] Surely they were entitled to know what was the opinion of Dublin Castle upon this subject. He warned the Government that this question would crop up again and again, and dog them throughout their existence as a Ministry. The First Lord of the Admiralty had pleaded for more time, saying that they should wait for the result of the deliberations of the Royal Commission charged with the investigation of the topic of local rates. Why should they wait? The Government did not wait for the Report of the Commission when it was proposed to give England something. ["Hear, hear!"]

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cumberland, Penrith

Income Tax Bill, Intro. April 30, 1402

(Rulings as Chairman of Committees)

Budget

The Chairman pointed out, that the hon. Member was now going into details relating to a Blue-book the consideration of which, by the common consent of the Committee, had been deferred to a later day. Of course, he had no power to prevent the hon. Member from going into the matter April 29, 1322

The Chairman said, he had stated that, as a point of order, he could not stop the hon. Member from going into the matter; but, now that he was challenged on the matter he was bound to say that it was irrelevant at the present stage to go into the minute details of a Blue-book, and, therefore, he must request the hon. Member to desist from going into them April 29, 1322

The Chairman said: "The principle of the Bill was decided on the Second Reading. The hon. Member must confine his remarks to the Amendment he is moving." April 12, 1058

The Chairman said: "I told the hon. Gentlemen he was not in order in discussing the general principle of this Bill, which has been already decided by the House. He is moving an Amendment, and he must confine himself to that Amendment." April 12, 1059

The Chairman said: "There is no necessity for an hon. Member to rise at all. The Standing Order simply says that those who support the decision of the Chairman shall rise, and that those who challenge it shall also rise. There is no power to compel an hon. Member to rise who does not wish to do so." April 12, 1063

Supply: £23,000 for Houses of Parliament Building

The Chairman said: "The hon. Member is misinformed. It is only Members of the House who are committed to the Clock Tower." April 9, 894

Supply: £5,177 for Land Registry

The Chairman said, the question of legislation dealing with Land Transfer could not be discussed on that Vote April 30, 1368

The Chairman said, if the hon. Gentleman had any suggestion to make by means of which the Land Registry Office could be made more useful under the existing legislation, he would be in order, but if the only suggestion he could make was that certain fresh legislation should be introduced in order to make the office more useful, he would not be in order April 30, 1370

Supply: £3,400 for Police Courts, London and Sheerness

The Chairman said: "I do not quite follow how the hon. Gentleman connects his arguments with the Vote." April 30, 1381

The Chairman said: "If the hon. Member means to argue that the Metropolitan Police Force ought to be placed under the London County Council, that would require legislation, and would not be in order on the present Vote." April 30, 1381

The Chairman said: "There are no rates levied in respect of the Metropolitan Police Courts. This is a sum charged on the Exchequer. If the hon. Member raises a question of rates, that cannot be discussed in Committee of Supply." April 30, 1381

The Chairman said: "The hon. Member is in error. The Metropolitan Police rate does not arise on this Vote." April 30, 1382

Supply: £159,100 for Public Buildings (Great Britain)

The Chairman said: "I do not think that the hon. and gallant Gentleman can contend that the Nelson Monument is an ancient monument." April 9, 870

Supply: £204,451 for Supreme Court of Judicature

The Chairman said: "The question before the Committee is not the salaries of the Judges." April 30, 1367

The Chairman said: "The remarks of the hon. Gentleman are now out of order." April 30, 1368

The Chairman said, it would not be in order to discuss the question of retirement of Judges upon the present item April 30, 1368

THE RIGHT HON.
WILLIAM COURT GULLY, Q.C.,
Carlisle

Questions
The hon. Member is replying to the answer which has been given and arguing upon it April 1, 279
If the hon. Member persists so frequently in continuing to ask questions after I have risen and ruled them out of order, I shall have to call the attention of the House to the matter April 1, 280
Questions put merely for the purpose of satire are not in order April 1, 285
The Question which the hon. Gentleman is asking does not arise out of the Question on the Paper April 5, 530
The hon. Gentleman must take the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to what his answer really was April 6, 619
The right hon. Gentleman has said that he is not in a position to answer the Question April 12, 956

Rules and Order of Debate
I could not accept that Motion. The Chief Secretary has stated his views as a private Member, and for the hon. Member, after the Debate has begun to draw to a close, to move the Adjournment of the Debate in order to allow the right hon. Member to have the opportunity of reconsidering his views would be an abuse of the Rules of the House Mar 30, 93
I have no business to consider what action will be taken on the subsequent clauses. I can only say that this Motion for an Adjournment is an abuse of the Rules of the House Mar 30, 93
I cannot see that the observations of the hon. Member are relevant to the Amendment before the House, which relates only to the Financial Relations between England and Ireland, and not to the question how Ireland is to be improved Mar 30, 160
It will be my duty, assuming that the Motion, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," be defeated, to put the Question, "That those words be there inserted." If any Debate arise that Question cannot be put unless the Closure be moved and carried Mar 31, 242

The question of the division of rates has been disposed of by the decision of the House on the Amendment, and that cannot be discussed again April 1, 307
The question of what employment will be given on the building has nothing to do with the purchase of the site April 1, 332.
That is not relevant to the matter under discussion. The hon. Member is entitled to make his protest, but he cannot go into foreign questions April 1, 334
I must ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the expression. It is a most improper expression to use April 1, 336
The Secretary to the Treasury was explaining a Treasury Bill, and the hon. Member interrupted him and said it was a Treasury swindle. That is a most improper expression April 1, 336
Whatever the hon. Member meant, it was an improper expression to use, and I hope he will withdraw it April 1, 336
The hon. Gentleman made use of the expression, while the Secretary to the Treasury was speaking, and if it were nothing else it was a disorderly interruption. I must ask him to withdraw the expression April 1, 337
I think that Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House. I have the alternative of either refusing it, or taking an immediate Division upon it, and I adopt the latter course April 1, 345
The Bill has been before the Examiners, and they have certified that on all those matters of which they have cognisance the Standing Orders have been complied with. Therefore it is ripe for Second Reading April 1, 346
I think the Amendment is not in order. This is a Motion which must be made according to the regular practice of the House in the case of a public Bill which seeks private Bill powers April 1, 347
This is not done in lieu of sending the Bill to the Standing Committee. This is a proceeding which the ordinary practice of the House provides in order that persons whose private rights are affected may have an opportunity of appearing and being heard. After the Bill has been before the Committee, it will come back for consideration by a Committee of the whole House. April 1, 349
The use of the word "alleged" is improper if it were used in the sense, as it seemed to me that it was, of suggesting that something stated by the right hon. Gentleman was not true. As to the word "fraud" in connection with the Treasury such words are extremely objectionable in Debate; but, unless they amount to a specific personal allegation against an hon. Member, they are hardly out of order. The action of the Government, as a whole, can be denounced in much stronger language than can be used about an individual Member of the House. But the hon. and learned Member goes extremely near the line April 1, 352

That is not in question upon this Bill, which is only a Superannuation Bill. There is no question as to who shall pay the salary or who shall appoint April 5, 587

The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, in accordance with the invariable practice of the House where private Bill powers are sought by a public Bill April 5, 590

That Motion is not one for the nomination, but for the appointment, of the Committee. The nomination will be subsequently moved April 5, 590

The hon. Member is not keeping to the question before the House. The question of the effect of Protection upon the agricultural labourer is not the question before the House April 6, 664

This Bill was passed by a very large majority last Session, and a Motion to refer it to a Select Committee was defeated by the operation of the Half-past Five o'clock Rule. It has been very fully discussed this afternoon, and, therefore, I think I am justified in now accepting the Motion April 7, 710

I must point out that the merits of the scheme cannot be discussed. The only question which can properly be raised is whether an irregularity should be put right, and that without reference to whether the scheme is a good or a bad scheme April 8, 762

This is a Bill for the purpose of removing an irregularity, and of giving the House an opportunity of discussing the merits of the scheme on a future day April 8, 767

I have not referred to "Hansard," and do not know in what context or under what circumstances those observations were made; but, having fully considered this Bill—I do not know whether it is the same Bill—I am clearly of opinion that the merits of the scheme cannot be discussed April 8, 767

The hon. Member cannot, after my ruling, proceed to argue on the merits of the scheme by quotation from, and comment on, an article in a periodical April 8, 774

Perhaps I had better state first my recollection of what actually did take place at the last Sitting of the House. The Bill referred to passed through Committee after a discussion of some two hours, and when I came into the Chair, the Motion was made "That the Bill be now read the Third time." No objection was taken on the point of order to the Third Reading, but the hon. Member for Caithness immediately rose in his place, and proceeded to move that the Bill be read a Third time that day six months.

An hon. Member, in supporting that Amendment, did object, not by way of raising a question of order, but as a matter of argument, to the Third Reading being taken the same night of a Bill which, he said, was a contentious Bill. Therefore the particular point which the right hon. Gentleman now takes was never raised. But as the right hon. Gentleman asks me what my ruling would have been, assuming objection had been taken, I may say that I do not understand the Rule to be as broad as he seems to suggest. There is no absolute Rule that the Third Reading cannot be taken immediately after the Report without the universal assent of the House. It is the more ordinary practice of the House—which, probably, it would desire to continue in the majority of cases—that only one stage should be taken at a time; and, in the case of a really contentious Bill, debated between the two sides of the House, two stages should not be taken at the same Sitting. With regard to the ruling to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, in which Mr. Speaker Peel gave an opinion that it was not a question of leave like the withdrawing of a Motion, but of the vote of the House, I think that correctly states what is the Rule of the House. If the question be proposed and objection be raised, the House then has the right to determine whether it will take the Third Reading or not. I do not think that that question has been pressed against objection taken, except in cases where there has been something exceptional in the extent or character of the opposition. The decision of Mr. Speaker Peel seems to me to have carefully laid down what the Rule is; and I may point out that since then, as lately as June 2, 1892, when the Clergy Discipline Immorality Bill was before the House, and when there was no urgency, there was a Debate on the Report stage, and several Amendments were moved and Divisions taken by a minority limited in number. After the conclusion of the Report stage, the Third Reading of the Bill was asked for. The question was put, and there was a Division, when the question was carried by 135 to 14 votes. And there are other precedents. As regards the other point raised—namely, that the particular Resolution under which the House sat upon that Monday prevented the proceedings of which the right hon. Gentleman complained—I may point out that that Rule did not prevent anything from being done which could in ordinary circumstances have been done under the Order for the Committee on the Bill. If there had been no such Resolution on that Order being called, and the Committee stage taken, and Report made without amendment, the Third Reading might have been moved and taken. There was, therefore, nothing

in the Resolution which could prevent the House from disposing of all business which could under ordinary circumstances have been dealt with under that particular Order of the Day. For these reasons I think that the proceedings were in order April 26, 1079

The Question put by the hon. Member on the paper called my particular attention to the terms of the Standing Order, and on consideration of them I have come to the conclusion that a vote of the House taken under that Standing Order is not a Division. [Cheers.] The Standing Order provides that the Speaker or Chairman, after calling on the Ayes and Noes to rise in their places, shall "either declare the determination of the House or name Tellers for a Division, and, in case there is no Division, shall declare to the House or Committee the number of the minority who had challenged his decision, and their names shall be thereupon taken down in the House and printed with the list of Divisions." The effect appears to me that it is a vote of the House, the result of which is declared from the Chair without any Division. It is a technical point, but that, I think, is the effect of the Standing Order. The Standing Order no doubt requires that the names of those who voted in the minority shall be printed with the list of Divisions, but such record ought not to be numbered or reckoned as a Division. [Cheers.] I shall give directions that in future the practice of printing it as a Division be discontinued April 29, 1248

The Bill relates to the Service Franchise only, whilst the Instruction proposes to alter another Franchise, and it is therefore outside the scope of the Bill May 3, 1510

The only question before us is the alleged inequality in the treatment of Ireland in the matter of agricultural rating. It seems to me that the hon. Member is now arguing a much wider question May 6, 1626
